Mr. WASHINGTON. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 2556) for the relief of Phillip Kopplin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Phillip Kopplin, late a private in Company A, First Regiment Missouri Cavalry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. WALKER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2566) for the relief of Phillip Kopplin, have had the same under consideration and submit the following report:

Claimant enlisted August 1, 1861, as a private in Company A, First Missouri Cavalry, and was discharged September 17, 1864. In application filed December 22, 1885, he alleges that while in line of duty, at Black Water Creek, Missouri, about December, 1861, he incurred hernia of right side by being thrown forward upon the pommel of his saddle while his horse was jumping said creek. The claim was rejected on the ground of no record and insufficiency of testimony.

Prior to enlistment the claimant's soundness and freedom from hernia is fully proven.

Louis Kolb, who was a private and corporal in claimant's company, says:

"That claimant became disabled by being thrown on the pommel of his sad dle, as he was informed; that he remained in company quarters two or three months. For about three weeks after he became disabled he waited upon said soldier, taking his meals to him and cooked for him. He did not know what his trouble was, but learned that it was hernia of right side, and he has every reason to believe that the soldier's statement was correct, as he always regarded him as a truthful and reliable man."

Jacob M. Gruen testifies—

"That he served in the same company and regiment, and knows that claimant, in an attack by guerrillas, was thrown forward against the pommel of his saddle by an unexpected jump of his horse, receiving injuries which disabled him to such a degree that he had to be conveyed in the company team for the rest of the march of his command from Black Water Creek, Missouri, to Fort Leavenworth, Kans., where he was confined in his company's quarters for months, totally unfit for any kind of duty."

Joseph Ibach and Henry J. Sterlin, members of said company and regiment, testify substantially to the facts stated above.

The medical examining board found right inguinal hernia extending into scrotum as large as a goose egg, and gave him a total rating for hernia of right side.

Charles Schlufferth testifies—

"That he sold claimant a single truss March 17, 1874, and several years previous had sold him a single truss, but he can not fix the date, as it was sold for cash, and no account was made of the time."

The committee believe that the evidence is sufficient to establish the fact that the disability was incurred in the Army and in line of duty, and that it continues to the present time. We therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZA N. AIKEN.

Mr. WEAVER. I desire to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 10856) granting a pension to Eliza N. Aiken. I want to say that I call up this bill, which is Mr. MASON'S bill properly, although she served in that part of the Army that I had the honor to serve in. This lady is very old, about seventy-one years of age; and I call up the bill for Mr. MASON, as his name was passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a pension is hereby granted to Eliza N. Aiken, at the rate of $100 per month, to commence from the passage of this act, and the Secretary of the Interior is instructed to place her name upon the pension-roll in accordance with the provisions of this act.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10856) granting a pension to Eliza N. Aiken, submit the following report:

Mrs. Eliza N. Aiken, aged seventy-one years, a resident of Chicago, Ill., served throughout the late war as a Government nurse.

She entered the service in connection with the Sixth Regiment Illinois Cavalry Volunteers in the fall of 1861, and served with it until January, 1862.

From January to July, 1862, she was on duty at St. Mark's hospital, Paducah, Ky.

From July to November, 1862, she was at the hospital of her regiment, Sixth Illinois Cavalry, stationed at Memphis, Tenn.

In November and December, 1862, she was on duty at the Ovington general hospital, Memphis, Tenn.

From January, 1863, to January, 1865, she was on duty as matron at the Adams general hospital, Memphis, Tenn.

From January to June, 1865, she was on duty at the Washington general hospital, Memphis, Tenn.

Throughout her service she was most untiring in her efforts to relieve the sufferings of sick and wounded men, and took care of them as if they were her own children. She soon became known as "Aunt Lizzie" among the soldiers, and thousands of the men who were nursed back to life by her never knew her correct name.

Mrs. Aiken was not only a skillful nurse, but was fully as helpful to the men under her care by her cheerful and hopeful manner and by inspiring them with new courage and ambition. She sacrificed her own comfort, from the beginning of her service to the end, to secure that of the disabled soldiers, and her efforts in their behalf were never relaxed until all had been done that possibly could be done, or until she was obliged to cease work from physical exhaustion.

Thousands of men who were able to return to their homes or to resume their places in the field owed their lives to her devotion.

In June, 1865, she returned to Peoria, Ill., and immediately upon being relieved from duty and from the responsibilities she had borne, was taken sick and for months was confined to her room, completely worn out by hard service in the hospitals.

Though her health was never fully restored she has devoted herself incessantly to works of charity up to the present time, and goes about relieving the unfortunate and distressed, notwithstanding her advanced age, daily.

In view of the facts of this case the committee recommend that said bill be amended by striking out all after the second line of said bill and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eliza N. Aiken, late nurse of Sixth Regiment of Illinois Cavalry Volunteers, and pay her a pension of $25 per month."

And that said bill as amended do pass.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. R. S. HORTON.

Mr. WHEELER. I call up the bill (H. R. 8) to restore Mrs. R. S. Horton upon the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, empowered and directed to replace or restore Mrs. R. S. Horton, widow of Capt. William H. Seaton, late of Company D, Twenty-sixth Ohio Volunteers, upon the pension-roll.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8) to restore Mrs. R. S. Horton to the pension-rolls, have carefully examined and considered the same and the papers connected therewith, and find that the proposed beneficiary of the bill, the said Mrs. R. S. Horton, was lawfully married to Capt. William H. Seaton, who was duly enrolled as captain of Company D, Twenty-sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on the 8th day of June, 1861, and was honorably discharged from the service on the 6th day of December, 1862, having resigned, on surgeon's certificate of disability occasioned by chronic diarrhea, contracted in the service and in the line of duty, from which disease he ultimately died on September 28, 1864, at Jackson, Mich. That in the mean time, to wit, on the 10th day of December, 1863, said Capt. W. H. Seaton filed with the Pension Office his application for an invalid pension.

After his death his widow, Rachel Seaton, filed an application for pension in her own right, completed the same in due conformity with the requirements of the Pension Office, and was pensioned from the 11th day of December, 1863, at $20 per month, under certificate 63644. That on the 14th day of August, 1866, said Rachel Seaton remarried with one James H. Horton, and by reason of said remarriage her pension ceased on said day. That there was, as the fruit of the former union, a minor child, Sarah L. Seaton, who was pensioned at $2 per month from the date of her mother's remarriage, to wit, August 16, 1866, to the 18th day of August, 1877, the day on which Sarah L. Seaton became sixteen years of age, when all pensions on account of the services and death of said Capt. William H. Seaton terminated under the law.

The committee find further that the second marriage of said Rachel Seaton—known thereafter as Mrs. R. S. Horton—was not so happy or fortunate as she had expected it would be; that her husband, James M. Horton, finally deserted and abandoned her, having for seven or eight years prior to said abandonment failed to provide for her support and maintenance, and during all of which time was left dependent upon her own exertions as a milliner and the assistance of friends, for the maintenance and support of herself and her minor son, whom she had borne to said James M. Horton; that after said abandonment had continued for more than four years, said Mrs. R. S. Horton applied for and obtained a divorce from said James M. Horton, under the laws of the State of Alabama, as will fully appear from the copy of the decree of the court, which the committee incorporate with and make a part of this report.

Decree of divorce. The State of Alabama, Morgan county. In chancery. Sixth district, northwestern chancery division. March term, 1887. Rachel S. Horton, pro ami Lelia S. Wilder, vs. James M. Horton. No. 220.

This cause coming on to be heard at this term, was submitted upon the bill of complaint, decree pro confesso, and testimony as noted by the register; and upon consideration thereof the court is of the opinion that the complainant is entitled to the relief prayed for in her said bill.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the bonds of matrimony heretofore existing between the complainant and defendant be, and the same are hereby, dissolved, and the said Rachel S. Horton forever divorced from the said James M. Horton for and on account of voluntary abandonment, and that she have the custody, maintenance, and education of the child the result of the marriage and described in the bill. No alimony is prayed for in the bill or allowed, it not appearing that the defendant has any property; on the contrary it appearing from the proof the complainant has been for years supporting herself and children.

It is further ordered that the said Rachel S. Horton be, and she is hereby, permitted to again contract marriage.

It is further ordered that Lelia S. Wilder, the next friend, pay the costs herein to be taxed, for which execution may issue.

THOMAS COBBS, Chancellor.

March 10, 1887.

The State of Alabama, Morgan County. In chancery, at Somerville, Ala.

I, William E. Skeggs, register in chancery for the sixth district of the northwestern chancery of the State of Alabama (composed of said county of Morgan) do hereby certify that the above and foregoing papers, from 1 to 17 inclusive, contain a true and complete copy of the record in a certain cause pending in court of chancery for the district and division aforesaid, wherein Rachel S. Horton by next friend, L. S. Wilder, complainant, and James M. Horton, defendant. Decided at the March term, 1887, of said court as the same remains of record in my office. In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of office this the 11th day of March, 1887.

WM. E. SKEGGS, Register.

The committee find further that the said Mrs. R. S. Horton is now in extremely straitened circumstances, forced to support herself, the daughter of first husband, the hereinbefore mentioned Sarah L. Seaton, now a widow, and her minor son, the fruit of her second marriage; and that, believing that the before-recited decree of divorce from said James M. Horton restored her to all the rights and privileges she enjoyed as the widow of Capt. William H. Seaton, she applied to the Pension Office to be restored to the pension-rolls, as will more fully appear from her application to the honorable Commissioner of Pensions, which the committee desire to incorporate in and make part of this report:

"DECATUR, ALA., March 10, 1887.

"SIR: The undersigned, formerly borne on the United States pension-rolls under No. 63644 and name of Rachel Seaton, as the widow of William H. Seaton, late captain of Company D, Twenty-sixth Ohio Volunteers, at the rate of $20 per month.

"That she was dropped from said pension-rolls on or about the 14th day of August, 1866, for the reason of subsequent marriage of the undersigned.

"That said subsequent marriage has been declared null and void, and a decree of divorce, a vinculo matrimonii, has been granted the subscriber, and a certified copy of which said decree is herewith forwarded, and to which reference is made.

"That the undersigned now applies to be returned to the pension-roll of the United States and for all the benefits of the acts of Congress in her case made and provided.

"RACHEL SEATON HORTON.

"To the Hon. COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS,

"THE STATE OF ALABAMA, Morgan County:

"Before me, William E. Skeggs, register in chancery in and for said county, personally appeared Rachel S. Horton, who, being duly sworn according to law, doth depose and say that the facts hereinbefore related are true, and that she makes this application for the purpose of restoration to the pension-rolls of the United States; and I certify that she is the identical person she represents herself to be.

"Given under my hand and seal of office this March 10, 1887.

"WM. E. SKEGGS, Register."

The committee find, finally, that the said application of said Mrs. R. S. Horton to be restored to the pension-rolls has been rejected by the Pension Office upon the ground that the cohabitation of the second marriage precludes the office from entertaining the proposition.

After careful and impartial consideration of all the facts connected with the case, the committee are clearly of the opinion that, in point of fact, the divorce of said Mrs. R. S. Horton from her second husband, James M. Horton, has the effect of restoring her to the position she was in before the said second marriage was contracted; and that, while the strict construction and rigid administration of the laws which very properly obtain in the Pension Office may justify the action of said office in refusing to restore the said Mrs. R. S. Horton to the pension-rolls, she is, in equity, entitled to such restoration as the effect of her lawful divorce, and the committee therefore report the bill back without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY A. RAMSAY.

Mr. WILKINSON. I call up the bill (H. R. 11197) for the removal of the political disabilities of Henry A. Ramsay.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That all political disabilities imposed upon and incurred by Henry A. Ramsay, of Maryland, by virtue of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, be, and they are hereby, removed.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11197) for the removal of the political disabilities of Henry A. Ramsay, imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, report as follows:

The committee recommend the passage of this bill.

Henry A. Ramsay was an officer in the Navy of the United States and afterwards accepted service as an officer in the navy of the Confederate States. He asks Congress to remove the political disabilities imposed upon him by the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan (before the reading of the report was concluded). I ask that the further reading of that report be dispensed with. Nobody objects to the removal of these disabilities.

By unanimous consent, the further reading of the report was dispensed with.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MATILDA SPANGLER.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10106) to place the name of Matilda Spangler on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Matilda Spangler, widow of John E. Spangler, deceased, late a private in Michigan Battery, Captain Lamphier, commanding.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

John E. Spangler, late private of Captain Lamphier's battery Michigan Volunteers, enlisted January 17, 1862, and died in the hospital at Louisville, Ky., while in the service, May 6, 1862, of typhoid fever. John Spangler was married to Matilda Anderson September 4, 1860, which is proved by copy of the record of marriages in Hancock County, Ohio. She applied for pension in the Pension Department, which was granted October 23, 1872; was dropped from the pension-roll July 21, 1877, by reason of remarriage.

By her own affidavit and those of other creditable witnesses, which are made and appear in this report, your committee are satisfied that the marriage was contracted through misrepresentation and fraud. On October 22, 1872, she married Michael Zellers, who told her immediately after said marriage that he married her to cut her out of her pension; that her brother had done some business for him, had charged him too much, said he robbed him, that he was bound to get even with him, and that immediately after said marriage said Zellers was guilty of extreme cruelty and gross neglect of duty towards her; that she was afraid of her life to live with him, and said marriage contract only lasted three months, when she procured a divorce, and that Michael Zellers soon after married another woman, and that she has never been remarried since and is unmarried still.

Michael Zellers had put all his property out of reach of law, which deprived her of alimony and left her destitute. She is now old and entirely destitute, helpless, and without any means of support.

The precedents are numerous where pensions have been allowed by special act of Congress where the former husband had died in the service, and your committee after a full investigation and carefully considering the evidence herewith submitted and all the circumstances connected with this case, have come to the conclusion that justice demands that she shall be restored to her former pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

STATE OF OHIO, Hancock County, ss:

Before me, the undersigned, a notary public in and for said county, personally came Matilda Spangler, who, being first duly sworn, says: That she resides in Findlay, Hancock County, Ohio; that her age is forty-four years, May 15, 1888; that she is the widow of John E. Spangler, who was a private in Captain Lamphier's (Michigan) battery during the war of 1861 and 1862, and while in the Union service he died at Louisville, Ky., on May 6, A. D. 1862; that on account of the services of the said John E. Spangler she, as the widow of John E. Spangler, was pensioned about September, 1864, at the rate of $8 per month; that while living with said John E. Spangler there was born to them one child, Effa Spangler, who is now married, and with whom affiant now lives, but she being in poor circumstances, said affiant is obliged, although in poor and very delicate health, to earn her living by her own work. This affiant received said pension of $8 per month from 1864 to October 22, 1872, at which time she was married to one Michael Zeller, and her pension at that date, to wit, October 22, 1872, went to her daughter until said daughter was sixteen years old, which was July 22, 1877, after which no pension was received.

Affiant says that after said marriage with Michael Zeller, he, said Zeller, told her immediately after said marriage that he married her to cut her out of her pension in order to spite affiant's brother, W. H. Anderson, who is a lawyer. Affiant says that said Zeller told said affiant immediately after said marriage that affiant's brother had done some business for him, and had charged him too much; said he had robbed him, and he was bound to get even with him; and affiant says immediately after said marriage that Zeller was guilty of extreme cruelty toward her, and gross neglect of duty, and his conduct toward her was such that it was dangerous to live with him; that she only lived with him three months; he said he had accomplished his purpose, cut her out of her pension, got even with her brother, and that her brother might now support her, and other terrible treatment.

Affiant only lived with him three months and then brought suit for divorce, to which petition for divorce said Zeller put in no answer or no appearance, and on the 28th day of May, 1873, in Findlay, Hancock County, Ohio, she was divorced from him, and had her name changed back to Matilda Spangler by decree of the court. This occurred about seven months after marriage.

This Michael Zeller shortly married another woman near Bluffton, Allen County, Ohio, and shortly after died. Affiant has never been married since, and is now, as said before, an unmarried woman. Affiant further says that immediately after said marriage to said Zeller he put what little property he had in his father's name, so as to cut her out of alimony. Affiant had not been acquainted with him but a few weeks before her said marriage, and he represented that he was well off and would care for her and her child. Affiant says she has nothing in the world to support her except her own exertions. Affiant says she is in delicate health, poor and needy, and that said marriage was fraudulently made on the part of said Zeller to wrong her, and has done so. Affiant says her parents are both dead and left her no property.

Affiant says: (1) In short, that she is an unmarried woman; (2) she was left a widow by the death of John E. Spangler, a loyal soldier of the Union Army, while in the United States service. He died in the service at Louisville, Ky., May 6, 1862; (3) that she received a pension from 1864 to October 22, 1872 (showing she was entitled to same); (4) that she was by fraud deprived of her pension, etc.; (5) affiant says she thinks it the duty of the proper authorities to right a wrong.

MATILDA SPANGLER.

Sworn to and subscribed before me and in my presence this 25th day of May, A. D. 1888.

[SEAL.] ORM A. BALLARD,
Notary Public.

STATE OF OHIO, Hancock County, ss:

Before me, the undersigned, a notary public in and for said county, personally came Mary Ullery, who, being first duly sworn, says she is the sister of Matilda Spangler, widow of John E. Spangler, who was a private in Captain Lamphier's (Michigan) battery, and who died while in the Army, at Louisville, Ky., on May 6, 1862. Affiant says she is a widow and resides in Findlay, Hancock County, Ohio, and is aged fifty-six years; that her circumstances are such that she is not able to take care of her sister, Matilda Spangler; that Matilda Spangler drew a pension of $8 per month from time of her husband's death until from May 6, 1862, to October 22, 1872, at which time she was married to Michael Zeller; that she lived or tried to live with him about three months, and on account of his treatment toward her was obliged to separate, and in about seven months after her marriage obtained a divorce from him.

Affiant says that immediately after said marriage of her sister to said Zeller, affiant asked Zeller why he treated her sister so cruelly, and said Zeller remarked he never expected to live with her when he married her. He had got even with Bill (meaning my brother, W. H. Anderson) and he might take care of her. He said my brother had swindled him once, and he married her to cut her out of her pension, so my brother might take care of her. He said a great many other things about her and my brother which I can not now recollect. Affiant says her sister was never married afterward, and now is an unmarried woman; that she is poor in health and circumstances, and while she lives with her daughter has to work for her support. Affiant says she thinks that her sister ought certainly to be restored to her pension out of which she was defrauded.

MARY ULLERY.

Sworn to and subscribed before me and in my presence this 25th day of May, 1888.

[SEAL.] ORM A. BALLARD,
Notary Public.

STATE OF OHIO, Hancock County, ss:

Before me, the undersigned, a notary public in and for said county, personally came William H. Anderson, who, being first duly sworn, says: That he is the brother of Matilda Spangler, who is the widow of John E. Spangler; that said John E. Spangler, with whom affiant was well acquainted, was a private in Captain Lamphier's (Michigan) battery during the rebellion. Affiant resides in the city of Findlay, Hancock County, Ohio, is fifty-one years old, and a lawyer by profession. That shortly prior to the marriage of my sister, Matilda Spangler, to Michael Zeller, in 1872, said Zeller came to my office and counseled me in reference to his former wife's estate, the said Zeller being a widower at time of his marriage to my sister, Matilda Spangler. I charged him for counsel and he paid it, but said he would get even with me for same before he died. He was an eccentric fellow and I had to watch him. He at one time followed me and drew a hatchet on me; of course I retreated. The marriage to my sister was unknown to me until it was afterward consummated. After his marriage he told me he had got even with me, that he had succeeded in cutting my sister out of her pension. He was guilty of extreme cruelty and failed to provide for her, and damned me to get her a divorce (which I did).

She was receiving $8 per month as pension, as the widow of John E. Spangler, who served his country from some time in 1861 to 1862, and died in the service, for which she was receiving pension. And that this eccentric man, by his fraud practiced on her, only lived with her three months, and stopped her pension.

Affiant says it is a wrong that, in his opinion as an attorney, ought by Congress to be righted by bill to restore her to pension-roll.

Affiant says his said sister is an unmarried woman, has never married since divorced from said Zeller. That she is poor, needy, and anxious that Congress will take favorable action in her case. Of course I could detail further, but deem it unnecessary.

W. H. ANDERSON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me and in my presence this 25th day of May, A. D. 1888.

[SEAL.] ORM A. BALLARD,
Notary Public.

P. S.—For her character and standing in community, I refer to Hon. E. S. Williams, Hon. George E. Seney, and Hon. S. S. Yoder, of House of Representatives.

W. H. ANDERSON.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY CALVERT TRUXTUN.

Mr. WISE. I call up the bill (S. 2275) granting a pension to Mary Calvert Truxtun.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Calvert Truxtun, widow of the late Commodore William T. Truxtun, of the United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month; said pension to be in lieu of her present pension.

Mr. CHEADLE. In order to save time, I ask that this bill go over to be considered along with the bill which has already been postponed this evening.

Mr. WISE. What is the gentleman's objection to this bill?

Mr. CHEADLE. I object to all these cases where it is proposed to pension persons at a greater rate than that authorized by law.

Mr. WISE. Have you read the report?

Mr. CHEADLE. It does not make any difference about the report.

Mr. WISE. You intend to object to the bill anyhow?

Mr. CHEADLE. I object to all of them.

Mr. WISE. Then I ask unanimous consent that this bill take the same course that was agreed to in regard to the bill of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE]—that it go over until to-morrow with the understanding that it be considered in the House.

Several MEMBERS. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that this bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be made a special order in the House to-morrow immediately after the bill increasing the pension of Mrs. Elizabeth G. Scott, and under the same conditions. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to understand the effect of the order just now made.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill was laid aside with a recommendation that it be reported to the House with the understanding that it be made a special order for to-morrow, immediately after the bill of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE]; that the previous question be considered as ordered and that there be fifteen minutes' debate on each side.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. On what day is the bill to come up?

The CHAIRMAN. To-morrow.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not like to object where there seems to be unanimous consent——

The CHAIRMAN. When this bill is reported to the House the gentleman will have an opportunity to object. The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole can not control the action of the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. What I wish to suggest is that as Friday night is given to pension bills and the day session of Friday to private claims, it seems to me the time of the House on other days should not be taken up with private business. To-morrow we may wish to consider the sundry civil appropriation bill.

A MEMBER. We did not consider the Private Calendar to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole simply reports its recommendation to the House; and when this bill comes up in the House it can then be determined what order shall be made.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. WISE. As the bill called up by me has not been acted upon, I take the liberty of asking the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10621) to remove the political disability of John H. Parker, of Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks to call up a bill for the removal of political disabilities. What is the number of the report?

Mr. WISE. We do not need any report in this case. I will send up the bill in a moment.

Mr. WHEELER. While the gentleman is finding his bill, I ask consent to call up another bill for the removal of political disabilities.

Mr. CANNON. I have staid here now two or three nights waiting an opportunity to call up a bill——

Mr. WHEELER. It was stated on the other side that there is no objection to passing these political disability bills.

Mr. CANNON. I will not object if I can have the right also to call up a bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks to call up for consideration a bill for the removal of political disabilities, the title of which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3178) to remove the political disabilities of William L. Bradford.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? The Chair hears none.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the political disabilities of William L. Bradford, late an officer in the Navy of the United States, arising under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

The report (by Mr. CULBERSON) is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having considered the Senate bill No. 3178, to remove the political disabilities of William L. Bradford, recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have a little bill——

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Some of us have been waiting here a long time to have our bills considered.

Mr. CANNON. Why did you not object in the case of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. WHEELER. I got my bill in during a hiatus.

BETSEY A. MOWER.

Mr. YODER called up the bill (S. 2838) granting an increase of pension to Betsey A. Mower.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Betsey A. Mower, widow of the late Joseph A. Mower, a major-general of United States Volunteers in the late war for the Union, to the rate of $75 per month.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2838) granting an increase of pension to Betsey A. Mower, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions is as follows:

"The applicant is the widow of Maj. Gen. James A. Mower, who died in 1870 of disease contracted in the service. The widow was pensioned at $30 per month, and this was increased to $50 by a special act of Congress. She has two children dependent upon her, one of which has been an inmate of an insane asylum for many years.

"The widow's husband left her no estate whatever, and she therefore asks Congress to increase her pension to $100 per month.

"In view of all the facts the committee recommend an increase to $75 per month."

The meritorious services of General Mower, who served his country for nearly a quarter of a century in all grades from that of a private in the war with Mexico, as well as the dependent condition of his widow, afford ample justification for concurrence in the recommendation contained in the above-quoted report.

The committee therefore return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. YODER. As there will be objection to this bill, I ask that it take the same course with the two bills which are to be considered the first thing in order on Tuesday morning next, after the reading of the Journal, fifteen minutes to be allowed for debate on each side.

Several MEMBERS. The other bills went over until to-morrow.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not object to Saturday, but I do object to the bill being set for Tuesday of next week.

Mr. YODER. Let the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be postponed until to-morrow immediately after the special order is disposed of, fifteen minutes to be devoted to debate on either side, when the previous question is to be considered as ordered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not object to Saturday, but I will object, as I have already stated, to any day being set apart next week until after the sundry civil appropriation bill has been disposed of.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be called up Saturday immediately after the special order is disposed of, fifteen minutes of debate being allowed on either side, when the previous question is to be considered as ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. NICHOLS. I was not present when my name was called, and I ask, by unanimous consent, to call up a bill.

Mr. CANNON. I demand the regular order.

JOHN GERMAN.

Mr. ADAMS called up the bill (H. R. 3504) for the relief of John German.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and that he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions of the pension laws, the name of John German, father of Philip German, deceased, formerly of Company G, Twenty-fourth Illinois Infantry.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the application of John German, father of Philip German, deceased, late of Company G, Twenty-fourth Illinois Volunteers, for father's pension (No. 261515), submit the following report:

This case was rejected May 18, 1886, upon the ground that at the date of the soldier's death the claimant was not dependent upon him for his support.

This soldier enlisted June 30, 1861, and died in Andersonville prison May 24, 1864 (grave No. 1340). The first wife of claimant and mother of soldier died in Germany, April 1, 1843. In 1855 the claimant was living in Chicago in a little house of his own on leased ground, on North Franklin street. He exchanged this house for a piece of sandy land in Lake County, Indiana, in 1863, where he made a home until 1878, when he sold it and bought a small house and lot in the village of Dalton, Cook County, Illinois, where he is now living. He had one horse, a wagon, and two cows in 1878, a few farming utensils, this being all the personal property he owned.

Claimant had three boys in the war of 1861, all of whom died. Philip did more toward the support of his father than any of the other children. He was a finisher in a furniture store in Chicago before the war, earning about $7 per week, one-half of which he gave to his father for his support and that of the family. While in the war Philip sent money from time to time for his support, at one time a $20 gold piece by express to Ainsworth Station, Ind.; at another time he sent $50 to his father from Centerville, Mo., by Lieut. George Wolf, of Company C, Thirteenth Illinois Cavalry, and also sent money to his father at different times from Murfreesborough, Tenn.

John German, son of the claimant and brother of Philip, formerly of Company C, Thirteenth Illinois Cavalry, died of lung disease contracted in the service. Carl, another son of the claimant and brother of Philip, who was in the service, is dead. Claimant's second wife is dead.

Dr. A. J. Sparks, of Kensington, Cook County, Illinois, testified in 1883 that the claimant was old and feeble and unable to support himself; that he had attended him as his physician at different times; that he had a small house and a lot of from 100 to 200 feet in the village of Dalton, but did not think, from the appearance of things, that he had any means for his support.

Carl Sprink, of Riverdale, Cook County, Illinois, testified in 1884 that claimant's income, while he lived in Lake County, Indiana, was not over $75 per annum. Henry Weatherman testified to the same effect. Other witnesses testified that after claimant moved to Dalton, Cook County, Illinois, he earned a scanty living by working in his garden and by hauling swill to the neighbors from the distillery in his one-horse wagon; that part of the time he was too feeble to work; that his neighbors were in the habit of plowing his garden for him every spring without charge.

This old man furnished three boys for service in the late war, all of whom are dead; the claimant's second wife is dead. He has eked out a miserable existence since his helpmate and children have been taken from him; is now seventy-seven years old, in feeble health.

The only question presented by this record is the dependence of the father on the son, the soldier, for support. It is not material now to know whether or not at the time of the enlistment the father was depending on the soldier for support or not, but it is certain from the evidence now on file that if the soldier was now living the father would be depending on him for support, and this being within the rule adopted by this committee, we therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LUCY WAGOR.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, called up the bill (H. R. 10256) to place the name of Lucy Wagor, of Hillsdale, Mich., on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to place the name of Lucy Wagor, of Hillsdale, Mich., mother of Martin Wagor, deceased, late of Company I, First Michigan Sharpshooters, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10256) to place the name of Lucy Wagor, of Hillsdale, Mich., on the pension-roll, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Lucy Wagor is the mother of Martin Wagor, who enlisted in Company F, First Regiment Michigan Sharpshooters, November 15, 1862, promoted to second lieutenant of same company June 3, 1863, and was killed in battle before Petersburgh, Va., June 25, 1864.

Her claim for pension has been rejected because the soldier left surviving him a widow, who was entitled to and did receive a pension until her remarriage, about two years subsequent to the soldier's death.

The soldier left no minor child surviving him, and therefore all pensions on account of his death ceased with the widow's remarriage.

The evidence shows that upon the death of his father the soldier had the care of the claimant and her other children, and continued this charge after his marriage, about a year before his enlistment. After his marriage the claimant continued to live with him, and ever thereafter until his death received her support from him. She has no income, and is therefore dependent upon others for support. Her age is now seventy-five.

Congress has on many occasions granted relief to the old and dependent parents of soldiers who are excluded from the provisions of the pension laws by reason of the son's marriage, and believing from the evidence before us that this is a highly meritorious case, entitled to favorable consideration, your committee return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out all after the word "late," in line 5, and inserting therein instead the words "second lieutenant Company F, First Regiment Michigan Sharpshooters, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY HOOPER.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, called up the bill (H. R. 10504) granting a pension to Mary Hooper.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Hooper, widow of the late Isaac Hooper, lieutenant Company I, Eighty-fourth Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10504) granting a pension to Mary Hooper, submit the following report:

Mary Hooper is the wife of Isaac Hooper, late first lieutenant of Company I, Eighty-fourth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry. Isaac Hooper was mustered into service December 7, 1861, and resigned or was discharged February 28, 1862. He filed his application for invalid pension April 3, 1871, but died before it was completed. He died January 17, 1884. The widow filed her application for pension November 17, 1887. Isaac Hooper was discharged from service for chronic rheumatism and pulmonary consumption, from which he suffered for the past four months, as stated in his discharge.

Claimant alleges that he contracted typhoid fever in the service; that it was followed by weakness and numbness in his limbs, which continued to increase until his right leg has become almost useless. The fact that the disease was incurred in the Army and in line of duty has not been controverted. The claim has been specially examined and the reports of special examiners are on file, and was finally submitted to the board of reviewers, and was rejected on the ground of alleged cowardice. It appears from the evidence on file that the command was suddenly attacked and fired upon by our own troops in the night. The sudden attack caused a stampede among the men, and that this officer jumped into the water and made his way to a small island in the river, where he remained all night, and it is claimed contracted the disease of which he afterwards died.

The evidence of prior soundness, of the contraction of the disease in the Army from which he died, and in the service, is not disputed. The case was rejected solely on the ground that because this soldier, who had only been in service a short time, and whose men were raw recruits and had never been under fire, were suddenly fired upon in the night-time by our own men, his men were stampeded and became demoralized, not knowing where the fire came from or what forces they had to oppose, and among the rest this lieutenant attempted to save his life by jumping in the water and making his way to the island.

That he suffered from the disease he contracted in the Army, subsequently and constantly, is not denied, and that his death was caused by the disease contracted in the Army is plainly shown. That there was a great deal of doubt existing with regard to the justice of this claim by the board of reviewers is evident by the voluminous testimony and three or four special examinations that have been made on the case, and it is, to say the least, a grave doubt, as it is expressed by a majority of those who have examined into the case, both special examiners and reviewers, as to the justice of rejecting the claim.

After a due investigation of the evidence on file your committee have come to the conclusion that this is a case of merit and that the widow is entitled to a pension, and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SHADRACK W. BROWN.

Mr. BACON called up the bill (H. R. 8993) for the relief of Shadrack W. Brown.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Shadrack W. Brown, late of Company D, One hundred and seventy-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "volunteers," in line 7, the words "at the rate of $40 per month."

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8993) for the relief of Shadrack W. Brown, having carefully examined into the same, do respectfully report:

That the said Brown was duly enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States as a private in Company D, One hundred and seventy-sixth New York Volunteers, in October, 1862, and was honorably discharged November, 1863, at the expiration of his term of service; that he was captured at Brashear City, La., in May, 1863, when his company was in action, and was paroled and restored to duty in August, 1863, and continued to serve until he was discharged.

The claimant testifies that at Bonnet Carre, La., on October 15, 1863, while at target practice under orders from his officer, he was injured by a piece of a cap which struck him in the left eye.

This statement is corroborated by the affidavits of several of his comrades who were present when the accident occurred. The statements of members of his family and reliable neighbors show that he had no imperfection of vision at the time of his enlistment, and that immediately upon his return and uniformly thereafter and for many years before he applied for his pension, he stated that he had escaped injury in the war except from a piece of a cap striking him in the eye, which had impaired his sight. This injury resulted in the loss of the sight of his left eye shortly after his return, and later on in the loss of the sight of his right eye. He is now and has been for years entirely blind, and is poor and dependent upon relations and friends for his support.

His case was rejected at the Pension Office because there was no record of the accident in the War Department, and because the commanding officers of his company do not remember the accident. The report of the Adjutant-General shows that his company and regimental record are not on file for October, 1863.

The medical examiners and medical referees report him as totally blind. The disease which occasioned this blindness is stated by them to be traumatic cataract, not senile or congenital cataract. This establishes that the cataract was the result of a direct injury of such a kind as he testifies to. The claimant has always been estimated by his neighbors as a hard-working, truthful man who faithfully endeavored to support himself and his family by his own labor.

Your committee are satisfied that he is entitled to a pension, as asked, and report the bill back with the recommendation that it do pass, amended, however, by inserting after the word "volunteers," in line 7, the words "at the rate of $40 per month."

Mr. BACON I ask that that amendment be disagreed to, as I am satisfied it is a clerical error both in the bill and in the report. The bill provides that the man shall be placed on the pension-roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and I do not see why he should be required to take any less.

Mr. CHIPMAN. This report was made by me, and I am somewhat surprised at the conclusion of it. I think the amendment ought not to be adopted, but that the man should be remitted to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The report states this man is totally blind, and under the law he would be entitled to a larger pension.

Mr. BACON. I do not know whether to a larger or smaller pension, but it is evidently a clerical error. It is not in the same handwriting with the bill, and has evidently gotten in there by mistake. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] is of the opinion that it is a clerical error.

The amendment was disagreed to.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

IRENE RUCKER SHERIDAN.

Mr. BINGHAM called up the bill (H. R. 11113) granting a pension to Irene Rucker Sheridan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Irene Rucker Sheridan, widow of the late Philip H. Sheridan, General of the United States Army, and to pay her a pension, from the passage of this act, at the rate of $3,500 per annum.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out "$5,000" and insert "$3,500."

Mr. CHEADLE. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of the Invalid Pensions Committee whether or not the claim of Mrs. Sheridan has been sent to the Pension Office and rejected?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Of course not.

Mr. CHEADLE. I shall object to the consideration of this bill to-night; and I object to it especially for this reason, that two weeks ago I called up a bill in this House which had been considered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It was reported adversely because of the fact that the claimant had not gone to the Pension Department, when the pensioner showed by his affidavit that the injury occurred when he was alone and that it was physically impossible to obtain the legal status that was required in the Department. The House refused to grant that old veteran—more than seventy-two years of age—a pension. Now, I want to know whether in this Congress there shall be one rule established for the poor and another and different one for the rich; whether the humble pensioners in this country are to have one rule by which their pensions are to be granted and the rich and those high in official life are to have another and different one?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no disposition to enter into any kind of controversy with the gentleman from Indiana as to this claim. But under a general statute of course the only way that Congress can consider the claim of an officer who has died from wounds, or injuries, or disease contracted in the line of duty in the service of the United States, is first its rejection under the pro forma rules of the Pension Office, and after the party has fully complied with the pension laws. That is where the claim has been rejected.

I am not familiar with the particulars of this case to that extent as to be able to determine that in all respects the general principles laid down by the law have been positively carried out; and that the heirs or the widow of General Sheridan have fully complied with the statute, which, however, is fully and thoroughly familiar to all of those who are identified with the regular service, and after the rejection of the claim by the Department to come to Congress as the dernier ressort. But I believe that to be the case here.

I have no remark or reflection to make upon the case the gentleman from Indiana cites. I have only to state that this bill has gone through the Pension Committee; that all the requirements of the statute have been complied with, and that it is before the House to-night on an amendment to grant to the widow of the distinguished soldier the pension named. I trust the gentleman will make no objection to the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that under the rule adopted this evening it is the privilege of each member, when his name is called, to ask for the consideration of a bill. The only question is upon the motion to adopt the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. CHEADLE. I feel compelled to object to the bill, unless a quorum acts upon it. I want to say that if there is in this tribunal of the people, this court of dernier ressort, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania terms it, to be established one rule to govern us and by which we are to grant pensions to the widows of the musket-carriers and another and different rule to the widows of the officers of the regular Army and the officers of the volunteer Army, then I want to know it and to know it right here and now.

There never was a greater outrage perpetrated in the history of legislation by the American Congress than when this House of Representatives refused to grant a pension to Joseph W. McConnell, who must have been at least forty-five years of age in 1861 when he enlisted in the Fifteenth Indiana Regiment at the very outbreak of the rebellion, and incurred a disability when he was alone, and he set forth the facts in an affidavit, his character being certified to by the leading citizens in the county in which he lives, and I stated here under the solemnity of the oath, administered to me in that area, that I had been acquainted with him since 1862; that he was a man of the very highest integrity and personal character, and the House denied the right that he claimed and that he had a right to claim, to cure the defect in his testimony, and send him to the Pension Office to be pensioned according to his disability at the rate fixed by the general law. I repeat, therefore, that if there is in this country one system of procedure to be applied to officers of high grade and another and different one to be applied to those who carried the musket, I want to know it.

Mr. Chairman, in this country we claim that equality before the law is the birthright and inheritance of all our citizens. If this rule of class legislation is to apply and if we shall have another and a different rule for men in whatever rank or grade in the service, then let us clearly and definitely settle that question now.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Why can not you call up the bill to which you refer and pass it now?

Mr. CHEADLE. Because the House rejected it upon the request of a gentleman who is now a candidate for the office of governor of the State of Indiana.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me ask the gentleman if he thinks he remedies that wrong by objecting in this case?

Mr. CHEADLE. I say this, sir, that if there is one rule by which we are to judge of the pensionable qualifications of one citizen and another rule for another citizen, I ask this House to establish that rule now. Let us, and let the country, know what it is. I want to say that it was not the major-generals, nor the brigadier-generals, nor the colonels, nor the captains that saved this country in the time of its trouble. It was the musket-carriers, the men of the muskets and knapsacks, who did the work.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHIPMAN. What is before the committee? The gentleman has objected to the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the only question before the committee is the motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House, the first question being on the amendment.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Is that the pending motion?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Does the five-minute rule apply in this case?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not.

Mr. CHIPMAN. It seems to me that we are occupying the entire time of the session with this discussion and doing nothing. I hope the bill will be allowed to go over if we can not have it acted upon to-night.

Mr. BINGHAM. I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana that I take no issue with him upon the question that he raises; all I ask is that this bill shall have a fair hearing before the House on its own merits.

Mr. CHEADLE. I object to the consideration of the bill in the absence of a quorum. I have no objection to its going over to a full House with a reasonable time granted for debate and for the consideration of the bill, at which time I wish to be heard upon the question of special pension legislation.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow the bill to go through this evening?

Mr. CHEADLE. Not without a constitutional quorum.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then the gentleman is to call no quorum?

Mr. CHEADLE. I shall do so if necessary.

Mr. BINGHAM. That being the case, I am perfectly willing to accede to the gentleman's request that the previous question be considered ordered and the bill go over to be considered in the House immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning, with fifteen minutes allowed on each side for debate.

Mr. COX. I would not ask for debate; nobody will object to the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. I want to enter an objection here. I will not agree to fixing any time out of its regular order for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. KILGORE. I will resist the passage of the bill, and intend to do it. If you want to call it up to-night let it take its course. I will not agree that it shall be fixed by this committee to-night for consideration to-morrow or on any other future day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is the purpose of the gentleman to block all legislation in connection with the matter? As I understand it, this is not a question for present consideration, but that the matter shall go over to a full House. The gentleman from Indiana calls a quorum, and the purpose is to reach the consideration when a quorum is present. For that reason I have asked that the bill go over until to-morrow morning, because we never have a quorum at these evening sessions. What is the purpose of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. KILGORE. My purpose is to beat the bill, and there is no misunderstanding that language.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is before the committee for consideration. Objection has been made to the unanimous request asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CANNON. I understand the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Pennsylvania can agree that it shall go over to a full House, but that the gentleman from Texas gives notice that he desires to beat the bill and will make a point of no quorum. If it is to be considered here to-night a quorum will be demanded. If the gentleman from Texas desires to take that position evidently we all understand there is no quorum present.

Mr. WISE. If the gentleman will allow an interruption, I understand the gentleman from Indiana to demand a quorum.

Mr. CANNON. He is willing that it shall go over to a full House.

Mr. BURNES. So is the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from Texas is willing to agree to that——

Mr. BINGHAM. In view of that, will the gentleman from Texas indicate any time, any reasonable time, when he is willing to have it considered?

Mr. KILGORE. Take your own course with it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would request that to-morrow morning, or any other morning that the gentleman would name, be fixed for its consideration. I want the matter to go to a full House. I am sure the gentleman will not object to a full discussion of the question before a quorum of this body.

Mr. KILGORE. The legislation is not so very important, I take it, that it can not pursue the regular course. If the gentleman in charge of the bill prefers to submit it to the House to-night, I give notice that I will employ all the methods that are placed at my command by the rules to defeat it to-night, and I will not agree that this body shall refer it to the House to be considered to-morrow or any other day.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the bill be passed for the present, and that it retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if that will leave it just as it was before it was called up to night?

The CHAIRMAN. It will leave it in statu quo.

Mr. KILGORE. Then I have no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am perfectly willing that it shall remain as it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN] asks that this bill be laid aside without being acted on and retain its place on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CHARLES JUNOT.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 10687) granting a pension to Charles Junot.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles Junot, of Louisville, Ky., who served in the Florida war under the name of Tom Jones.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10687) granting a pension to Charles Junot, have considered the same and report as follows:

The claimant, under the name of Thomas Jones, was a private in Capt. Alexander Jernigan's company of Florida Mounted Militia from March 2, 1840, to November 14, 1840; and the regiment did duty in the Florida Indian war. A land-warrant was allowed this claimant for the services rendered, his identity being established in that claim.

He is now sixty-six years of age and in needy circumstances, being also physically disabled.

His case would fall within the provisions of the general-service pension bill for the survivors of the Indian wars from 1832 to 1842, favorably reported by this committee at the present session of Congress.

Your committee recommend the allowance to the claimant of a service pension, and therefore report the bill back recommending its passage, amended, however, by striking out, in lines 4 and 5, the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws" and inserting at the end of the bill the words "and pay him a pension at the rate of $8 per month."

Mr. KILGORE. Do I understand the report to state that this soldier served in the Indian war of 1840?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. My recollection is that there was no war going on in 1840.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The gentleman should know, he is old enough.

Mr. WHEELER. He is not familiar with the history of the country.

Mr. CARUTH. I do not know the motive of the gentleman from Texas in objecting to this bill. This old man, who is now upon the verge of the grave, very aged and decrepit, served the country in the Florida war; the report of the committee shows that fact. And after we have given pensions to those who carried the flag of their country in the recent war of the rebellion and in the war with Mexico, why a poor old soldier who served the country anterior to that time should be denied this charity in his old age is a thing which I can not understand. I know this man well. I have known him for years. I know his condition. I know that as an act of charity he deserves this pension; and he deserves it for his services to the country.

Now, this report shows that this case has been regularly through the Pension Office. The soldier served in that war. His claim and his papers are all right, and why the gentleman from Texas should object to it is a thing that I can not understand. I ask the reason why there should be any objection to this bill for this poor old man.

Mr. KILGORE. I take it, Mr. Chairman, that this discussion is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. The bill is before the committee for consideration.

Mr. KILGORE. I say if the soldiers who served in that war and all the wars previous to the late war deserve a pension, there ought to be a general law applying to all of them. A few men ought not to be singled out and special favors granted to them in such a way. Besides, I am in earnest in saying there was no Indian war in 1840; it was in 1836.

Mr. CARUTH. I am willing to give the gentleman his way about that, and strike out "forty" and insert "thirty-six." [Laughter.]

Mr. KILGORE. I will insist upon my objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. As I understand the facts I do not want to take up the time of the House. I know nothing specially about this case. I took advantage of my name being called to do an act of courtesy to a colleague who is vigilant in the interest of his constituents. I think if my friend from Texas will think a moment he will see that this is a just claim.

Mr. KILGORE. Let it go over for the present, and I will look into the case.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The facts are that the Committee on Pensions have reported a general bill which covers this case. There was a war going on in Florida ever since the gentleman was born, and that was long before 1840, until the Indians who were not got rid of by being killed were transferred to the West. Now, this soldier served in that war and will come within the terms of the general law if that bill is passed. The position of the gentleman is simply this: that an act of justice to a class of persons not being performed ought to prevent an act of justice to a single person in that class. I hardly think that my friend will take the position that because we do not do justice to one hundred and fifty persons we ought not to do justice to the one hundred and fifty-first person.

Mr. ADAMS. I notice from an examination of the bill that this party was a private in "Capt. Alexander Jernigan's company of Florida mounted militia." It does not state that he was in the service of the United States. He might have been, as I am not familiar with the history of that Indian war, and neither do I know whether Congress has ever granted a pension to a person who was not in the service of the United States.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, yes.

Mr. GUENTHER. I rise to a parliamentary question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GUENTHER. Has objection to the consideration of this bill been withdrawn?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is before the committee for consideration, and the gentleman can only make his objection effective when the motion is made that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation. The question is as to the adoption of the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question was put; and the Chairman stated that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. KILGORE. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 1.

Mr. KILGORE. No quorum.

Mr. CARUTH. I desire to say from this action here to-night that so far as the gentleman from Texas is concerned his objection does not proceed from that pure motive which ought to inspire a member of this House; and because he has the advantage of me in the fact that there is no quorum here to-night I will withdraw the bill with the consent of the House and let the responsibility of the loss to this poor soldier of the United States rest where it belongs.

Mr. KILGORE. When I desire to be specially lectured for my conduct as a member of Congress [cries of "Regular order!"] I will call on somebody to lecture other than the gentleman from Kentucky. If I want him to lecture me I will invite him to do so. I am responsible for my action; and if any gentleman wants to object to it and make it a personal matter he can do so.

The motion to withdraw the bill for the present was agreed to.

JACOB PITNER.

Mr. BROWN, of Ohio. I call up the bill (S. 2371) granting a pension to Jacob Pitner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the name of Jacob Pitner, late private in Company K, One hundred and ninety-second Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, subject to the limitations and restrictions of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The committee adopt and make part hereof the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The Senate report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 160, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2371) granting a pension to Jacob Pitner, have examined the same, and report:

The claimant was a private in Company K, One hundred and ninety-second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry. It appears from the evidence of an eye-witness that about the 15th of May, 1865, he was kicked by a mule in the head and breast; was knocked down and trampled upon; remained insensible for several hours. He was treated in the quarters of the regiment, but not in hospital, for such injuries, partially recovered from them, but was discharged in September, 1865, as unable to perform duty.

He suffered much pain, and the wound in the crown of the head, occasioning a deep scar, was the cause of much nervous derangement. He was not able to do manual labor of any kind from the time of his discharge. He remained in this condition until 1873, when he was attacked by partial paralysis of the legs, and shortly afterwards became blind.

Both lay and medical testimony trace the disease of the limbs to the original injury as the probable cause. As to the loss of sight the physician certifies that it must be caused by some "intercranial lesion," as there is no evidence of any external disease of the eyes.

Although there may not be technically or medically a traceable connection shown between the diseases of the claimant and his present disabilities, the reason of objection, yet we conclude from the whole history of the case that these disabilities are the results of the injury received by him in the service and in the line of duty. He is now nearly sixty years old, very poor, can not walk without assistance, and totally blind. The disability is permanent, and he is very nearly as helpless as when he was first injured in 1863, in the Army.

We recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CYRUS MILLINS.

Mr. BUNNELL. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10258) to place the name of Cyrus Millins, of Ogden Centre, Mich., on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place the name of Cyrus Millins, of Ogden Centre, Mich., late a private of Company B, Fourth Michigan Infantry Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

Claimant alleges that in July, 1862, he contracted hemorrhoids. His claim has been rejected on the ground that the certificate of disability, upon which discharged, sets forth the existence of the disability prior to enlistment.

The record shows that claimant enlisted May 16, 1861, in Company B, Fourth Regiment Michigan Volunteers, and was discharged for disability as above stated April 11, 1863.

The captain of the company certifies under last-given date that Cyrus Millins is a brave man and has been a good soldier, but has become unfitted for military duty.

Lieut. Orrey S. Barrett, in April, 1866, testifies that soldier was attacked with bleeding piles at Harrison's Landing, and soon after sent to hospital; was more or less disabled therefrom after his return from hospital until discharged.

The same officer, in subsequent affidavit, states that he was very intimate with Millins before enlistment, and knows that he was sound at that time; did not complain of any disease during the first year of his service, and was an able-bodied and active man from time of joining the command to the close of the Peninsula campaign.

Dr. A. M. Wilber testifies to prior soundness, his enlistment with claimant, and the latter's disability from dysentery while in the service.

There are a number of affidavits, in addition to those above referred to, of neighbors and comrades, showing conclusively that claimant was free from hemorrhoids at enlistment; that he contracted diarrhea about the time of the battle of Malvern Hill, which resulted in the disability for which the pension is claimed. The affiants are persons of unquestioned veracity, and many are of high social standing.

Surgeon French, who made the adverse record in the case, makes oath that he was not acquainted with the soldier prior to his enlistment; in fact, did not know him until a short time prior to his dis harge.

The committee regret that the claim can not receive favorable consideration by the proper bureau because of the record adverse to the same. The evidence filed in rebutter is unusually strong, and fully convinces your committee that an injustice has been done claimant by the surgeon who, according to his own affidavit, knew nothing of the case until within a few weeks prior to the date of his certificate.

The bill is therefore reported favorably to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. SARAH J. MARTIN.

Mr. BURNES. I call up the bill (S. 2871) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah J. Martin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Sarah J. Martin, widow of Samuel Martin, deceased, late of Company H, of the Sixty-fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, who was pensioned under certificate numbered 43906.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The committee beg leave to report that they have considered this case, and adopt the report made in this case by the Senate committee as the report of this committee, and recommend that this bill do pass.

[Senate Report No. 1541, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2871) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah J. Martin, have examined the same, and report:

Claimant is the widow of Samuel Martin, who enlisted as a private in Company H, Sixty-fourth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, February 3, 1864, and was discharged on certificate of disability February 28, 1865.

The records of the War Department show that he was wounded in battle near Atlanta, Ga., July 22, 1864, causing amputation of left thigh, and that he was also wounded in right thigh and hip and contracted typhoid fever in the service.

The claim was rejected March 29, 1888, on the ground that the cause of soldier's death—paralysis—was not a result of his military service.

In her application, filed January 12, 1886, claimant states that her late husband, Samuel Martin, died August 1, 1885, of injuries received while in the service of the United States, and that he left no children surviving him.

In affidavit filed January 24, 1887, O. McR. Moke, of Paris, Ill., testifies that he was present when the late soldier was wounded in both legs and thighs.

In affidavit filed January 28, 1887, R. R. Roberts, a comrade, testifies that the soldier was wounded in battle at Atlanta, Ga., July 22, 1864, and that affiant was afterwards wounded about the middle of August, 1864, and sent to the general hospital at Rome, Ga., where he was placed in the same ward with the above-mentioned soldier; that the stump of said soldier's leg had been cut off once or twice, and that gangrene had set in; that the soldier was also wounded in the right leg and side; that he saw him every year from the time of his discharge from the service to the date of his death, and knows that he suffered from the disabilities above mentioned; that he visited the soldier during his last illness, and is of the opinion that his death was caused from his wounds and their effect upon his nervous system.

In affidavit filed January 25, 1887, Aaron Martin, of Libertyville, Ind., testifies that when he first saw the soldier after his discharge from the service one of his legs had been amputated, and that he was suffering from other wounds received at the same time; that he suffered from paralysis for a long time before his death, caused, in the opinion of affiant, from the effects of wounds received in the service.

In affidavit filed February 7, 1887, Sarah Ann Martin, of Kidley, Ill., testifies that she is the mother of the late soldier; that he lost his left leg in the service, and was also wounded in his right leg and side; that these wounds caused numbness of the limbs, making his arms and other leg almost useless; that one of the large cords of his right leg was cut by a wound in the knee; that owing to the crippled condition of the soldier it was difficult for him to use his crutches; that these wounds caused paralysis, which terminated fatally.

In affidavit filed January 18, 1887, Eli Martin, of Vermillion County, Indiana, testifies to the helpless condition of the soldier after his return home from the Army, and states that the paralysis from which he died resulted from wounds received in the service.

In affidavit filed December 11, 1886, Dr. James N. Downs, of Paris, Ill., testifies that he was acquainted with the soldier for about five years preceding his death, and that the said soldier had several attacks of paralysis during that time; that he never treated him, but was frequently consulted by the soldier with regard to his disability.

In affidavit filed December 11, 1886, Dr. S. K. Gray, of Paris, Ill., testifies that from 1867 to 1877 the soldier was very nervous from wounds received in the service.

In affidavit filed December 11, 1886, Dr. W. A. Buchanan, of Paris, Ill., testifies that he visited the soldier several times in July, 1885, and at that time he was paralyzed and suffering from a low grade of typhoid fever.

In affidavit filed January 18, 1887, George W. Wellman, of Paris, Ill., testifies that the soldier was a physical wreck long before his death, and that he died from the effects of wounds received in the service.

In affidavit filed June 29, 1886, Dr. H. S. Bell, of Paris, Ill., testifies that he attended the late soldier during his last illness, which terminated fatally August 1, 1885; that the immediate cause of his death was general debility, superinduced by injuries received in the service, and that the remote cause of his death was paralysis.

In a letter dated July 17, 1886, Dr. Bell states that it is supposed that the disease of brain and spinal cord resulted from wounds and exposure incident to camp life, and in an affidavit filed December 11, 1886, he testifies substantially as above.

A transcript from the records of Edgar County, Ill., shows that the cause of the soldier's death was general paralysis, and this certificate is signed by Dr. H. S. Bell.

In her petition praying that a pension be granted her claimant states that her claim was unjustly rejected on the ground that her late husband's death was not due to his military service, for he was severely wounded in the left leg, causing amputation of said limb, and was also wounded in the right leg and through his body; that a few years before his death his right knee seemed to have become disjointed, and that he was unable even to dress himself; that she is dependent upon her own labor for support, and is paralyzed in her right side.

This claim was recommended for admission by the legal examiner and reviewer of the Bureau of Pensions, but was rejected by the medical referee.

From all facts in the case it appears there can be no doubt that the soldier's death was caused by disabilities incurred in the service, and that his widow is entitled to a pension.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the committee rise and report its action on the various bills to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CLEMENTS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

Mr. CARUTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Just now, in Committee of the Whole, having called up a bill for consideration, I withdrew the call. Of course the bill retains its place on the Calendar, does it not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does.

BILLS POSTPONED.

The Clerk read the titles of the following bills:

A bill (S. 944) increasing the pension of Mrs. Elizabeth G. Scott;
A bill (S. 2175) granting a pension to Mary Calvert Truxtun; and
A bill (S. 2838) granting an increase of pension to Betsey A. Mower.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. These bills have been reported from the Committee of the Whole House with the recommendation that they be made a special order for to-morrow.

Mr. STEELE. These three bills are all in the same category. I ask that they be made a special order for to-morrow, not to antagonize appropriation bills or the bill of the Committee on Foreign Affairs——

Mr. SPRINGER. Or the Oklahoma bill.

Mr. STEELE. Or the Oklahoma bill; that they be taken up as soon as possible without interfering with any of the business that I have indicated, and that the previous question be considered as ordered upon them.

Mr. KILGORE. Let it be understood that there shall be an opportunity to discuss and amend these bills; otherwise I must object to this order. Once before when bills were carried over in this way the right of amendment was denied because it had not been specified in the order.

Mr. CHEADLE. The understanding in Committee of the Whole was that there should be fifteen minutes' debate on each side upon each of these bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The proposition is that these bills be laid over till to-morrow after the reading of the Journal; that their consideration shall not antagonize appropriation bills, the Oklahoma bill, or the bill of the Committee on Foreign Affairs; that the previous question be considered as ordered on each bill, with fifteen minutes' debate on each side, and with the opportunity for amendment. If there be no objection, this order will be made.

Mr. STEELE. I think it proper it should be added that the bills be considered to-morrow, or as soon thereafter as possible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be a continuing order. If there be no objection, the order as stated will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

POLITICAL DISABILITIES OF JOHN H. PARKER.

Mr. WISE. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10621) for the removal of the political disabilities of John H. Parker, of Virginia.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the House proceeded to consider the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the legal and political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States by reason of participation in the late rebellion, be, and they are hereby, removed from John H. Parker, of Chesterfield County, in the State of Virginia.

Mr. PAYSON. I will inquire whether the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] has personal knowledge with reference to this case?

Mr. WISE. Yes, sir; I have.

Mr. PAYSON. Does this gentleman desire the removal of his political disabilities?

Mr. WISE. Yes, sir; I ask the passage of this bill at his request.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. CHIPMAN moved to reconsider the votes by which the various bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The hour of half past 10 o'clock p. m. having arrived, the House, according to order, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, September 1, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by Mr. Thomas S. Pettit, one of the reading clerks.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The following was read:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 1, 1888.

SIR: I am compelled to be absent from the city from this time until Tuesday next.

Please present this note to the House in order that it may choose a Speaker pro tempore.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That JAMES H. BLOUNT, a Representative from the State of Georgia, be, and he is hereby, chosen Speaker pro tempore, to preside during the temporary absence of the Speaker.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT, on taking the chair, was greeted with applause.

Prayer was offered by Rev. S. Moylan Bird, of Galveston, Tex.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

NOTIFICATION TO THE SENATE.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to inform the Senate that the House has chosen JAMES H. BLOUNT, a Representative from the State of Georgia, Speaker pro tempore during the absence of the Speaker.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that next Saturday be set apart for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires first to lay before the House certain privileged matters.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. Res. 14) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to certify lands to the State of Kansas for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

Also, that the Senate agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8310) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Wallace military reservation in Kansas.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes; and asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes thereon, and had appointed Mr. DAWES, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. GORMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

POSTAL CRIMES, ETC.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (S. 3447) amendatory of an act relating to postal crimes, and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned, approved June 18, 1888.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill, and will state that a bill in substantially the same terms has heretofore passed the House and the Senate, but on account of an error in the bill it was returned by the Executive in response to a concurrent resolution of the two Houses. The pending bill passed the Senate by a unanimous vote, and I ask its immediate consideration.

Mr. MCCREARY. To-day was set apart——

Mr. DOCKERY. I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that this measure will excite no debate.

Mr. MCCREARY. I do not wish to be understood as waiving any right the Committee on Foreign Affairs may have.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read subject to objection.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. This is quite a long bill, and I think simply guards the Post-Office against the use of the mails for vile purposes. There can be no objection to the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. It was prepared by the Postmaster-General, and a similar bill has heretofore passed the House.

Mr. ROGERS. What change does this make in the bill which passed the House?

Mr. DOCKERY. In the bill as it passed the House there was a suspicion that an implied power was given to postmasters to open letters. Of course there was no such intention, and this bill eliminates that objectionable feature of the measure.

Mr. ROGERS. That is right as far as it goes.

Mr. CANNON. What is the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. I will ask that the bill be read

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it will save time to have the bill read.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I presume that this is the bill that was discussed in the Senate about a week ago?

Mr. DOCKERY. It is.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I want to say that to my mind this bill would shut out of the mails every book on anatomy that is published in this country. Now, I am very anxious to see an act passed of some kind which will prevent the sending of improper matter through the mails, but when it comes to the class of inspection that has been placed over the United States mail matter by certain inspectors in this country, I am entirely unwilling that cranks shall run the Post-Office Department. Any fair bill to exclude improper or obscene matter from the mail will meet my hearty approval; but a bill with such a wide discretion as this would give to certain classes of persons who may have charge of mail matter does not meet my approval, and I do not think can meet the approval of any member of Congress who will give the matter careful attention.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will the gentleman from New York specify what particular clause of the bill is susceptible of the objection he urges?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I refer to the general tenor of the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like the gentleman to name the clause that gives any such authority.

Mr. FARQUHAR. The whole merits of the bill were discussed in the Senate, and I take it from the tenor of that discussion. I have not myself very thoroughly investigated the matter.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to say to the gentleman that I do not think there is any such power expressed in the bill, nor do I believe it can be so construed by implication.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Then why is an exception made in regard to the first-class mail matter?

Mr. DOCKERY. For the reason that in the former bill which passed the House and the Senate, in the opinion of the Postmaster-General, implied authority was given postmasters to inspect mail matter of the first class, and of course it was not the intention of Congress to grant any such authority.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Do I understand that this bill meets the approval of the Postmaster-General?

Mr. DOCKERY. It was prepared by the Postmaster-General at the request of a Senator of my own State.

Mr. FARQUHAR. And receives his approbation?

Mr. DOCKERY. It does.

Mr. FARQUHAR. And also received the approval of the members of the House committee, as I understand, unanimously?

Mr. DOCKERY. No; the unanimous approval of the Senate committee. The House committee have not yet considered the bill as a committee, but some of its members have given it an informal investigation.

Mr. BLAND. How is it proposed that the postmasters are to ascertain the character of the mail matter?

Mr. DOCKERY. The bill wisely prohibits postmasters from opening letters to ascertain their contents, but if, for instance, an obscene letter is addressed to the gentleman from Missouri, he will have the authority under this bill which will enable him to punish the sender. The postmaster, however, has no authority to open the letter.

Mr. BLAND. How can he open any other matter?

Mr. DOCKERY. He can not.

Mr. BLAND. Why do you then make an exception of first-class mail matter?

Mr. DOCKERY. It was done out of abundant caution.

Mr. BLAND. Why not let that abundant caution apply to all mail matter?

Mr. DOCKERY. I am willing to accept the suggestion of my colleague from Missouri if he desires to offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Would it not be well to allow this matter to go to the Committee on the Post-Office and let it be disposed of in the regular way?

Mr. BLAND. I think myself that there should be no doubt as to the prohibition imposed upon the postmasters to have access to any similar matter.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then, in view of the suggestions of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR], I ask unanimous consent that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, with the right to report at any time.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is the proper course for it to take, because it is right that the committee should act upon a bill of this importance.

There being no objection, the bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, with leave to report at any time.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia, for ten days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BARNES, until September 10.

To Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, for twelve days from September 6, on account of important business.

To Mr. PATTON, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. FORD, for fifteen days, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. 1813) for the relief of Susan B. Hopkins, widow of Arvah Hopkins, late of Tallahassee, Fla., deceased;

A bill (S. 2197) empowering and directing the Commissioner of Navigation to register and enroll as American vessels certain sailing vessels of foreign construction, repaired in the port of Cleveland, Ohio, and named the Josephine and M. C. Upper, respectively;

A bill (S. 2825) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin T. Baker;

A bill (H. R. 2601) for the relief of the Baptist Female College of Lexington, Mo.; and

A bill (H. R. 5670) for the construction of a revenue-cutter for New Berne, N. C., to replace the revenue-cutter Stevens.

RETALIATION BILL.

Mr. MCCREARY. I want to call up House bill 11309, the title of which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11309) enpowering the President to carry out the purposes of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887.

Mr. MCCREARY. I report the bill from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as I was authorized to do last Thursday. A number of members on both sides of the House went away from here under the impression that this bill would be considered next Tuesday, and after consultation I ask that the consideration of this bill be postponed until immediately after the reading of the Journal on Tuesday next, and that it then be taken up and made a continuing order until disposed of.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Have the message and accompanying papers been printed and distributed?

Mr. McCREARY. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that he has suggested an additional reason why the consideration of this bill should be postponed until Tuesday. I have tried this morning to get a copy of the President's message, the treaties, and the acts of Congress in relation to the treaties, and have been unable to get them. I think that document containing the message and the treaties, etc., should be in the possession of the House at the time of the consideration of this bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The point that I call attention to is that sufficient time should be given for an examination of these documents and that is the reason I call attention to it. I think a further postponement than the gentleman suggests would be in order.

Mr. McCREARY. The document referred to will be in to-day, I am informed.

Mr. DUNN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNN. I would first ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question. Do I understand that he reports the bill to-day?

Mr. McCREARY. I so stated.

Mr. DUNN. I hope the gentleman will not report the bill until he is ready for it to be considered. When a privileged bill is reported it must either be considered or go on the Calendar.

Mr. HOLMAN He has asked unanimous consent.

Mr. DUNN. I take this position, and I ask, Mr. Speaker, if it is not true that when a privileged bill is reported for consideration at any time, as this is to-day, that it has to be considered at that time and can not be called up for consideration at any other time.

Mr. BLAND. That privilege was lost the other day.

Mr. DUNN. Oh, no; it has not lost that privilege.

Mr. BLAND. Oh, yes it has.

Mr. McCREARY. I am required under the order of the House to report this bill to-day.

Mr. DUNN. Then I ask, when the order was made last Thursday did the gentleman lose part of his privilege and will he lose any part of his privilege if the bill is not reported and not considered to-day? What effect would that have on his privilege?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Journal shows that to-day was fixed for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. DUNN. What effect had that on the privilege attached to the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that was limited to to-day. The consideration of the bill was fixed for to-day.

Mr. DUNN. The Chair thinks that under that order——

Mr. McCREARY. We have lost no privilege. I am compelled to report the bill to-day.

Mr. DUNN. I should be sorry if the gentleman has lost any privilege attached to the bill.

Mr. McCREARY. We have not lost any privilege. We were only required to report the bill to-day, and because the document I have referred to has not been sent up to the House and also because a number of gentlemen went away believing that this bill would be called up on Monday and Tuesday. I now ask that its consideration be postponed until immediately after the reading of the Journal of Tuesday, and that it be a continued order thereafter.

Mr. BAYNE. Let me ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question.

Mr. McCREARY. Certainly.

Mr. BAYNE. Has a report been prepared with the bill?

Mr. McCREARY. The report was published that was prepared.

Mr. COX. How long is it?

Mr. McCREARY. Very short.

Mr. BAYNE. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that no obstacle will be interposed by anybody in the way of the prompt consideration of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course there is no opposition to it on the part of anybody.

Mr. DUNN. What I am anxious about is the privilege attached to the bill. I hope it will not be placed in a category where it can be defeated by any filibustering process or any points of order, and there is no necessity for placing it in any such position.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] to modify his request so as to have this measure brought up immediately after the hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees. Otherwise I should be compelled to object, because the consideration hour of that day is the only hour that our committee have any hope of getting this session for the consideration of our bills. Therefore I ask the gentleman to modify his request, so as to leave us that one hour, and let this bill come up afterwards.

Mr. McCREARY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether he will be able to conclude the consideration of this bill on Tuesday.

Mr. McCREARY. I hope so, but I am not able to say.

Mr. SPRINGER. I earnestly unite with the gentleman in that hope.

Mr. FARQUHAR. We all do.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. So say we all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] asks unanimous consent that the consideration of this bill be postponed until Tuesday next after the consideration hour shall have expired, and that it be then taken up and considered from day to day until disposed of. Is there objection?

Mr. PERKINS. As I understand the proposition, the bill is not to be taken up each day until after the consideration hour has expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

OHIO CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I rise to a privileged motion. Heretofore, about the 15th day of August, the House having under consideration Senate bill 3182 making an appropriation to enable certain departments of the Government to make an exhibit at the Ohio centennial exposition, certain amendments were adopted. I entered motions to reconsider those amendments and called them up, but, finding no quorum present and not desiring to interfere with the business of the House, I withdrew them with the understanding that the privilege of the motions still remained. I now wish to call up those motions to reconsider, in the hope that the House will dispose of them and give us an opportunity to have the National Government make a small exhibit at the Ohio centennial, commencing next week. The first motion is to reconsider the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE]. The previous question having been ordered, the motions, I understand, are not debatable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct.

NAVAL MILITIA.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me for a moment to ask unanimous consent of the House to have Thursday, the 13th day of September, designated for the consideration of the bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs for the enrollment of a naval militia and the organization of naval reserve forces.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to name some other day, for the reason that if the Committee on Rules——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If there is to be contention over this matter, I think I had better not yield.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] asks unanimous consent that Thursday, the 13th day of September, be designated for the consideration of House bill 10622, the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that if that order is made it will be subject to reports of a privileged nature from the Committee on Public Lands, as I desire to report a bill from that committee on that day.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I will agree to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE]?

Mr. WEAVER. I have just come into the Hall, and I would like to know what this bill is.

The Clerk again reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. KILGORE. I demand the regular order.

OHIO CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I call up the motion to reconsider the vote adopting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] to the bill (S. 3182) making an appropriation to enable the civil departments of the Government and the Bureau of Agriculture, the Government Printing Office, the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum, and the Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the Ohio centennial exposition to be held at Columbus, Ohio, from September 4 to October 19, 1888.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. WISE, as follows:

That any surplus arising from appropriations made to either of the Departments by the act of May 28, 1888, for participation in the centennial exposition of the Ohio Valley, may be transferred and used for the same purpose to participate equally in the national exposition to be held in the cities of Augusta, Ga., and Richmond, Va., during the months of October and November of the present year.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Would it be in order to raise the question of consideration between that and an appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it would.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It is too late, the House having entered upon the consideration of this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is now too late.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The amendment has only been read.

Mr. OATES. I move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] to reconsider on the table.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I hope that motion will be voted down.

Mr. OATES. I know you do.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. OATES to lay on the table the motion to reconsider, it was disagreed to—ayes 30, noes 69.

The question recurring on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of Mr. WISE was adopted, the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understood from the Speaker the other day that it would be proper to vote upon all the motions to reconsider before again taking the question upon the amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is true.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I next call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] was adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. This is the amendment in favor of the Atlanta Industrial Exposition of the colored people of the United States.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] will be voted down by as decisive a vote as was the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following amendment:

Amend by adding the following:

"Whereas it is desirable to encourage the colored people in their efforts to promote the industrial progress of the race by the holding of a national industrial exposition in the years 1888 and 1889, in the city of Atlanta, Ga., to be held under the joint auspices of the United States, the Colored World's Fair Association of America, an institution for the public welfare incorporated under the general laws of Georgia, and of the city in which it may be located, and in which the works of art, field products, live-stock, manufactures, machinery, and other articles raised, fabricated, produced, or owned by colored people throughout the United States of America will be the chief exhibit, and which is designed to cultivate a thorough knowledge of the arts and trades among the colored people, create among them a stimulus to industry, and show the results of their progress in education, art, manufactures, the science of forestry, and horticulture, and furnish to the Government information as to the educational and industrial progress of its colored citizens; and,

"Whereas such an exhibition should be national in its character, and should have the sanction of the Congress of the United States: Therefore,

"Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States may, upon the recommendation of the board of directors of the Colored World's Fair Association of America, appoint eleven commissioners, who shall constitute a board of management of a national industrial exposition of the arts, mechanics, and products of the colored race throughout the United States of America, to be held in the years 1889–'90, under the auspices of the Colored World's Fair Association of America.

"SEC. 2. That the President of the United States may, upon the recommendation of the board of management of said national industrial exposition, appoint one commissioner and one alternate commissioner for each State and Territory, whose functions shall be defined by the said board of management.

"SEC. 3. That all of said commissioners shall be appointed within three months after the passage of this act.

"SEC. 4. That said board of management shall hold its meeting in the city of Atlanta, State of Georgia, and that a majority of said board of management shall have full power to make all needful rules and regulations for its government.

"SEC. 5. That said board of management shall report to the President of the United States a suitable date for opening and closing the exposition, a schedule of appropriate ceremonies for opening or dedicating the same, and such other matters as in their judgment may be deemed important.

"SEC. 6. That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States.

"SEC. 7. That whenever the President shall be informed by the said board of management that provision has been made for suitable buildings, or the erection of the same, for the purposes of said exposition, the President shall, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, setting forth the time at which the exhibition will open and the place at which it will be held.

"SEC. 8. That the sum of $250,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the public Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as a loan to the said national industrial exposition, to be used and employed by the board of management thereof to augment and enhance the success of the national industrial exposition in such manner as said board of management may determine, and in accordance with the provisions of this act: Provided, That the said sum shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States on the drafts of the president and secretary of the board of management of the national industrial exposition authorized by order of said board, one-third of the amount immediately after the passage of this act, upon being satisfied that $20,000 has been contributed and paid into the said board for the purposes of the exposition by the contributors to and shareholders of the national industrial exposition, and the remainder in two monthly payments thereafter upon being satisfied that each of the prior payments has been faithfully applied as required by this act; and for this purpose he shall have free access to the accounts and all transactions of said board: Provided further, That no greater amount shall be expended, or liability or indebtedness of any kind incurred upon buildings, grounds, and preparations than the aggregate sum that may be paid in by the subscribers to the capital stock and by donations, and the amount of the loan provided herein: And provided further, That in the distribution of the amounts that may remain in the treasury of the board of management after the payment of the current expenses of administration the amount of the appropriation hereinbefore made shall be paid in full into the Treasury of the United States before any dividend or percentage of profits or assets shall be paid to the holders of said stock or contributors: Provided further, That the Government of the United States shall not, under any circumstances, be liable for any debt or obligation created or incurred by the national industrial exposition or its board of management, or for any sum whatever in addition to the amount appropriated by this act; and that adequate space for such exhibits as the Government of the United States may see proper to make at said exposition shall be furnished free of all charge by said board: Provided further, That no sum shall be paid to the said board of management of said exposition until after the president and secretary and a majority of the members of said board shall have executed a bond, with good and solvent security, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, in the sum of $100,000, to sufficiently secure the safe-keeping and the faithful disbursement of the sum hereby appropriated, and for the faithful observance of this act with regard to the limitation of expenditures and liabilities as fixed herein, and for the repayment to the Government of the United States of the surplus of proceeds of said exposition remaining after payment of the current expenses of administration, said repayment in no case to exceed the loan. The receipt of the loan herein made, or any part thereof, by said board of management shall be a full acceptance of all trusts, conditions, and obligations of this act by the said board of management and by the corporation created under the laws of the State of Georgia and designated as 'The Colored World's Fair Association of America.'

"SEC. 9. That in case articles shall be imported for the sole purpose of exhibition at said fair, said articles being the work or production of the colored race, they shall be admitted without the payment of duty or of customs charges under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That all such articles as shall be sold in the United States or withdrawn for consumption therein at any time after such importations shall be subject to the duties, if any are imposed on like articles, by the revenue laws in force at the date of importation: And provided further, That in case any articles imported under the provisions of this act shall be withdrawn for consumption, or shall be sold without payment of duty as required by law, all penalties prescribed by the revenue laws shall be applied and enforced against such articles and against the persons who may be guilty of such withdrawal or sale."

Mr. OUTHWAITE (before the reading of the amendment was concluded) said: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the further reading of this amendment be dispensed with. Enough has been read to show the nature of the amendment; and I suppose it is generally understood, as it was discussed in the House when this question was last under consideration.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not object to dispensing with the further reading. It is understood that this is the amendment in favor of the national exposition of the colored people of the United States at Atlanta.

There being no objection, the further reading of the amendment was dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] to reconsider the vote by which this amendment was adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I wish to say that this amendment was put on the Columbus proposition. The gentleman from Ohio now moves to reconsider so as to get rid of the amendment; and I move to lay his motion on the table.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I have moved to reconsider so that this measure with reference to the Atlanta exposition may be considered hereafter as a separate proposition.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, there were—ayes 38, noes 45.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 33 voting in favor thereof.

Mr. OATES. Before the vote is taken will the Chair state the question, as I think some members do not understand it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa was adopted.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 87, nays 64, not voting 173; as follows:

No quorum voting.

By unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

Mr. HATCH. I am paired with the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. STEWART, and voted simply to make a quorum. I understand that no quorum appears on the vote, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask unanimous consent that the names of the absentees be again called, in order that there may be a quorum, as I understand several members have returned to the Hall since the call began.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The second call of the roll has been completed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not make any objection myself.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. My object is simply to secure the presence of a quorum, so as not to interfere with other business for this day.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will only ask if it has not been heretofore decided that, even by unanimous consent, the vote of a member can not be recorded after the second call of the roll unless he was actually present when his name was called?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not remember any decision upon the point.

Mr. DOCKERY. The Speaker of the House decided a few days ago that by unanimous consent the roll of absentees could again be called.

Mr. RYAN. I think that question was not raised; I want to say——

Mr. BLAND. I understand that no gentleman can vote after the second roll-call, even by unanimous consent, unless he was in the Hall and failed to respond when his name was called.

Mr. RYAN. That is correct.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I withdraw the request.

Mr. SPRINGER. I renew it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the names of the absentees be again called? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WISE. I wish to state that when I voted I had forgotten that I was paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. BOUTELLE. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. ENLOE. I desire to record my vote on this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman in the Hall when his name was called?

Mr. ENLOE. I was out for the moment, but entered immediately after my name was passed on the roll.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not entertain the request under the rule.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MASON. I voted "no." If he were present, I think he would vote "ay."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the pairs.

The following members were announced as being paired until further notice:

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. LONG.
Mr. HATCH with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be used in the investigation of any case or the prosecution of any person in the mining region of the United States for cutting, for mining or domestic purposes, dwarfed or scrubby timber unfit to be sawed or hewed into lumber of commercial value.

Mr. WOODBURN. I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

Mr. Speaker, as the House adjourned yesterday evening I was about to read an extract from the report of the Senate Committee on Public Lands upon which is based the existing law, in order to determine what construction they placed on its provision. The law of the 3d of March, 1878, under which prosecutions are now being made, by order of the Commissioner of the Land Office, in the State of Nevada applies only to the States of Colorado and Nevada and the Territories with the exception of Washington and Dakota. It provides that every bona fide resident or citizen may enter upon the public lands and fell timber for building, mining, and domestic purposes. I claim that under this act a miner in Nevada and Colorado and in the Territories can cut any kind of timber for the purposes mentioned in this act. But if there be any question about that the circuit courts in the United States and the supreme courts of many of the States have decided that the kind of timber specified in the Senate amendment does not come within the definition of the word "timber" as used in the acts of Congress relating to its preservation.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. They are only fit for fuel.

Mr. WOODBURN. That is all. The kind of timber mentioned in the amendment consists of scrubby pine, stunted cedar, and mahogany, sometimes called manzanita. I am familiar with every foot of the arid regions. I have lived there twenty years, and I know whereof I speak. This timber does not grow in the valleys nor in the level places, but is always upon the mountain crags, on the barren hillsides, peeping out sometimes between clefts of rock, without the slightest indications of soil for its nourishment.

That kind of timber we say is not embraced within the act which I have just alluded to. I call the attention of the House to the case of the United States vs. Schuler, reported in 6 McLean, volume 6, Circuit Court Reports of United States. That was an indictment containing two counts. The first count charges the defendant with being employed to remove and the second with aiding and assisting in removing timber from the lands of the United States.

In that case the court said:

The question then arose as to the interpretation of the word "timber." The court said it is a generic term. It properly signifies only such trees as are used in building. In this connection it is employed to signify the felled trees prepared for use and transportation, and embraces various uses to which timber can be appropriated, either in ship or house building, whether pine logs, squared timber, or any other form in which cut trees are prepared, either for the sawmill or transportation.

I read now from the second volume of Abbott's dictionary, in which several cases are cited as to what constitutes timber:

A contract for the purchase of "timber" does not pass a title to trees which are only useful for firewood.

That was decided in the case of Nash vs. —— 51 Maine, 417. Several other cases are referred to in McLean's reports, decisions of the circuit courts of the United States upon this point.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the only sort of timber that is found in the arid region of Eastern Nevada. My friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] knows the situation there. He knows that the town of Eureka with a population of six or seven thousand, imports its lumber from the town of Truckee in the State of California. The lumber is transported over 200 miles by rail to a point on the Central Pacific Railroad called Palisade, and from that, 80 miles, on a narrow-gauge road, to Eureka. Every man, woman and child in that town is dependent upon this timber for building, and not upon the kind designated in the Senate amendment. The act of Congress uses the word "building"—timber "for building." There is not a stick of timber in that country that can be used for that purpose, and therefore, under the uniform decisions, it does not come within the operation of a statute relating to the protection and preservation of timber on the public lands of the United States.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield for a motion that the House agree to the Senate amendment with an amendment providing that the money shall not be used in the prosecution, etc., except of persons or corporations who may have cut off this timber and sold it in other places than the localities where it has grown? The object is to confine the use of the timber to the mines in the neighborhood and to the population in the immediate vicinity.

Mr. WOODBURN. The gentleman must know that all that scrub timber within a circuit of 35 or 40 miles from the town of Eureka has been cut and used in the mines of the immediate vicinity. It is not fit for anything else. It can not be hewn or sawed or squared. It has no commercial value. It is used for smelting the ores and for domestic purposes, and for no other purposes.

I am willing that the Congress shall pass a law making it a misdemeanor to export from the vicinity any wood of the sort mentioned in the amendment.

Mr. BLAND. The point I make is this. If I understand correctly, the Government has reserved that timber for the benefit of local mining operations and for fire-wood. Now, I think it ought to be the law, if it is not, that any corporation or person who shall take timber from one locality and ship it to some other locality shall be subject to a penalty, because if they are permitted to do that the great benefit of the timber for mining purposes and for domestic purposes will be lost. In other words, individuals or corporations can now step in and take advantage of the Government's right and denude those localities of their timber and ship it off to other places, thus depriving the local miners and the local communities of the very benefit which the Government intended to secure to them. Therefore I supposed that the gentleman would be willing to agree to an amendment to the Senate amendment, providing that no prosecution shall be had except where the timber has been cut and transported to other localities for mining purposes.

Mr. WOODBURN. Before I consent that the gentleman shall offer an amendment of that sort I want him to point me to some law now existing, or some authority authorizing the Commissioner of the Land Office to bring the sort of prosecutions he has instituted on the information of spies in the State of Nevada. I want the gentleman to point me to an instance in the State of Nevada where that kind of wood ever has been used in any other locality than that in which it grew.

Mr. BLAND. If not, of course the amendment could do no harm, and it might do great good.

Mr. FELTON. The amendment as the gentleman proposes it would be rather vague. There are some places where timber is very necessary and where there is none to be found within 80 or 100 miles. This wood is worthless for any other purpose than fuel.

Mr. BLAND. My object is to prevent this scrub timber being cut and sent off to other localities. I believe it ought to remain in the localities where it grows for the benefit of the miners and other people there, and when you permit speculators to go there and denude that country of its timber you simply permit them to take advantage of the Government's liberality and to deprive the people of the locality of the advantage which the Government intended to secure to them. I do not know that any such case has occurred; but it seems to me that if the Senate amendment were amended in the way I have suggested there would be no objection to it. If it is a fact, as is claimed, that certain localities have been denuded of their timber for the benefit of distant communities, I think that ought to be stopped.

Mr. FELTON. What do you mean by a "locality?"

Mr. BLAND. A mining district. I suppose they are defined by the law. I understand that those districts are generally defined by local legislation, or by the customs of the miners. But whether that be so or not, I do not think this wood ought to be cut and sent away from one place to another to the exclusion of the home community.

Mr. FELTON. Neither do I; but you want to draw the line somewhere—you must define it.

Mr. WOODBURN. I say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that I do not see the necessity of any such amendment. No case has arisen or will arise to which it can apply.

Mr. BLAND. As I understand, the Commissioner of the General Land Office claims that such cases have arisen, and that great hardship to the local communities has resulted in that way. I do not know anything about the facts.

Mr. WOODBURN. The Commissioner of Public Lands has acted upon ex parte and false information. He has stated that the Richmond Mining Company, a foreign corporation, and the Eureka Consolidated, a California corporation, are the two principal corporations that have been guilty of frequent violations of the law of 1878. Now, my friend from Missouri must know that the discovery of silver in those mines gave birth to the two lively towns of Ruby Hill and Eureka, in the latter of which my predecessor, Mr. Cassidy, now resides. Every man and woman in the town of Eureka is dependent upon those two corporations for subsistence. Even though the Richmond Mining Company be an English corporation, its laborers, miners, engineers, blacksmiths, are all intelligent white Americans. If the policy of the Commissioner of the General Land Office were carried out, the town of Eureka would in sixty days cease to exist, and every house in it would be turned over to the Indians.

Now, I say to my friend from Missouri that the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate, in their report favoring the passage of the existing law, came to precisely the same conclusion that the miners of the silver region have come to and acted on for the last thirty years in regard to this sort of timber. I read from the report of that committee:

The committee have carefully considered the subject of timber and timber lands, and, after mature deliberation, with the view of devising the best methods of preserving, cultivating, and disposing of the same, have come to the conclusion that a distinction should be made between such trees as grow upon the mountains in the mineral districts and the forests of pine, oak, and other timber that grow in the more level portions of the country.

While the lumber of the latter is a regular and important article of commerce and is constantly being cut and transported in large quantities to ready markets, the character of the former renders the timber unfit for commercial purposes. Even were this otherwise, it is usually found in such inaccessible places as to preclude its transportation to market. Consequently it is used by the prospector, the miner, and other members of mining communities for domestic and other practical purposes incidental to the development of mineral districts. The committee do not believe that it would be wise policy on the part of the Government to seek to profit directly by the sale of this kind of timber nor to tax the pioneer by compelling him to purchase it. Except as a source of revenue by sale to the settler, it never can be of any value to the Government. Should the experiment be tried of requiring payment for it, it would be found that the cost of keeping agents for its sale and officers to prevent or punish infractions of the law at remote and widely separated settlements would largely consume all sums received for his timber by the Government. Thus, while it is practically of but little value to the Government, it is essential to the settler and indispensable to his occupation and development of the mineral lands. It has been the custom of Congress to encourage the exploration and development of the mineral regions of the United States; and in this connection it should be borne in mind that it is mainly to the indomitable energy, hardihood, and daring of the pioneer that we are indebted for the discovery and development of the rich gold and silver districts of the country. What would be the condition of this country to-day had it not been for our product of gold and silver during the last quarter of a century? The $100,000,000 annually added by the United States to the world's stock of bullion will amply pay for the use of the scattering timber found in those localities. Instead of imposing this timber as a tax upon this important branch of industry, the committee are of opinion that, under the restrictions provided in this bill and on the grounds of equity and public policy, the Government should allow its free use by the actual settler for the purposes alluded to herein.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if that be the true construction of the act of 1878, then there ought to be no objection to the Senate amendment. The Eureka Consolidated and the Richmond Mining Company seem to be the subjects on which the Commissioner of the Land Office is visiting his vengeance. Those two mining companies have taken out in years gone by many millions of dollars' worth of ore, but for the last six years neither of them has paid a dividend. The ore bodies gave out at a depth of 1,200 feet from the surface, and the companies are still employing a large number of men sinking still lower and trying to find new bodies of ore, employing the men of the towns of Eureka and Ruby Hill, and still keeping these communities in a flourishing condition. All that they have been guilty of is that they have probably made purchases occasionally from an Italian or a Chinaman or somebody else who has gone out on the barren hillsides, gathered the stunted timber, and carried it into Eureka. That is all the crime of which they have been guilty, and every man there does the same thing.

These corporations are no more liable, civilly or criminally, than the miner, regardless of the quantity of scrub timber they consumed in giving employment to labor and developing the country's mineral wealth.

Never but once in the history of this Government has any Commissioner of the Land Office or any Secretary of the Interior pursued the same policy as is now enforced by the present Commissioner. The very reason the present act was framed and passed by both Houses of Congress was that Mr. Schurz, when Secretary of the Interior, issued an order seizing upon timber of this very character in Helena, Mont., and ordered it to be sold for $1 a cord in the dead of winter to the freezing settlers. That action was condemned by both Houses of Congress; and to avoid a recurrence of it they passed this act of March 3, 1878.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the State of Nevada, regardless of political parties, are to-day fierce in their condemnation of the policy of the Interior Department. For the purpose of proving this, I send a telegram to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

EUREKA, NEV., August 31, 1888.

Hon. WILLIAM M. STEWART,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

To stop cutting scrubby timber on the public mineral lands for our mining companies would ruin this community. The companies would not suffer materially, as they can shut down and await the result of the litigation without material loss, but hundreds of poor men, many of them with families, are dependent upon the companies for their daily bread. They would be thrown out of employment without the possibility of obtaining it in any other business here, and universal distress and destitution would follow amongst them, and general financial distress amongst our business men. Can there not be an open investigation by responsible parties before any action is taken?

M. D. FOLEY.
BAKER & WINES.
CASSIDY & SKILLMAN.
C. C. WALLACE.
A. L. FITZGERALD.
R. SADLER & CO.
THOS. WREN.
A. E. CHENEY.
D. H. HALL.
WM. O. MILLS.
REMINGTON, JOHNSON & CO.

Mr. WOODBURN. I call the attention of this House to the names appended to these telegrams. Mr. Cassidy was my predecessor in Congress for two terms. He is now the nominee of the Democratic party for the same position. He has been living in that locality for the last fifteen or sixteen years. Mr. Wren was also a former member of Congress. A. L. Fitzgerald is the superior judge of that district, being elected by a large majority on the Democratic ticket in a Republican State. Mr. Mills is one of the officials of the Eureka and Palisade Railroad. Mr. Foley is a banker. Baker & Wines are the most prominent law firm in the town of Eureka, in Eureka County. Mr. Sadler is one of the leading Democrats of the State and one of the most prominent merchants of Eureka.

Mr. Speaker, the miners feel justly indignant at the action of the Interior Department for the reason that they have believed all these years that when, in 1866, the Government of the United States laid open the surveyed and unsurveyed mineral lands of this country to exploration and occupation, every man who was a citizen of the United States, or who had declared his intention to become such, might take up a mine and develop it. They supposed that that was a grant, and that it was something more than a mere inducement for them to enter into the arid wastes and explore and discover and develop and occupy mines. They believed it to be a grant in fact, and that it carried with it the inseparable incident of the right to cut and use this timber in the vicinity of the mine, without which the grant was a mere sham and utterly valueless. The miners have concluded—and they are intelligent men—that when Congress in 1872 said to them that when they discovered a lode they could go there and each locate 1,500 feet in length and 300 feet on each side for working purposes, and that after he had expended $500 for labor and improvements upon it, he was entitled to a patent for the claim, that that was a grant containing some substance.

Is it possible that this Congress will say to these miners "we justify the Government in taking your $500, notwithstanding the fact that you have exposed your life and limb in developing and locating the mines of that country;" but notwithstanding that they can not cut the timber in the vicinity of the mine, without which the patented land is not worth one cent? The miners do not expect that treatment from Congress; and my advices here to-day are to the effect, and from men of all political parties, that if this House refuses to grant their request, which is founded in justice, precedent, and law, that on the 6th day of November they will stamp the seal of their condemnation on the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who issued orders for the prosecution of the miners of Nevada for doing what they have done, in the language of the law, from almost time immemorial, or from the time that silver was discovered west of the Rocky Mountains.

Now, I say to my friends on the other side that the Mills bill, if it becomes a law, will seriously cripple the silver mining industries of the far West. Why? They reduced the tariff on lead $15 a ton, and at a time when, under the rulings of the Treasury Department, foreign lead, containing a modicum of silver, could come into the United States free, and it is well known to every experienced miner, and I appeal to my friend from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] to confirm what I say, that it would be a difficult matter to work any of the base ore mines in Idaho, Arizona, Eastern Nevada, or in Utah with any hope of profit in which the by-product of silver is lead. But this does more than that. It not only cripples, but it shuts down every mine in Eastern Nevada, every mine in Idaho that produces 50 or 60 per cent. of lead, and so also in Utah. I undertake to say, if the action of the Commissioner should be indorsed by both Houses of Congress, that within the next fiscal year the country west of the Rocky Mountains will not produce enough silver for use in the arts and sciences.

I suppose that when the Committee on Ways and Means inserted that reduction in the bill they did it unwittingly, for the reason that I know the majority of the Democrats on that committee have shown themselves in this House by their votes to be in favor of silver; and I was amazed, knowing that when the gentleman from Idaho made it clear that such reduction amounted to almost absolute ruin, that every one of them voted solidly for the bill as originally draughted in obedience to the orders of the St. Louis convention. Now I will yield the balance of my time, or whatever time he may require, to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eighteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Nevada; but I can not occupy much time to-day, because I am unable to physically, having come from a sick-bed to this House, knowing that this discussion on the appropriation for surveying our arid lands, with a view to ultimately reclaiming them, was to take place. Both these subjects are of great moment to my people.

Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely beyond my comprehension to understand why this body will continually refuse to assist the chief industry of our western coast. Your legislation and attempted legislation in regard to Territorial affairs is absolutely surprising. You seldom legislate in accordance with our wishes when there is a conflict of opinion. Whenever we get anything at all we have to contend for it, and fight for it, and plead and beg for it. Your legislation is generally adverse to us.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment.

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to ask to have an amendment to the pending amendment read, and would be glad to hear the gentleman upon it. I propose, with the consent of the gentleman, to offer an amendment to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, Nothing herein shall be construed to prohibit such prosecutions in cases where said timber has been cut or used by any corporation or persons for merchandise or sale in any other place or places other than the community where such timber is or was located.

Mr. WOODBURN. By the permission of the gentleman from Idaho I have risen to say one word. I am opposed to that amendment for the reason that it recognizes the right of the present Commissioner of the Land Office to institute these suits and bring civil action and criminal prosecutions against the miners of Nevada; and I say there is no warrant or authority to be found in any act of Congress or in any regulation of the Interior Department that is in consonance with the spirit and letter of this act; and the object of that Senate amendment (it was offered by Senator STEWART, of Nevada) was simply to prevent a repetition of the orders heretofore issued by the present Commissioner, so that the miner should not be in the future harassed by prosecution and civil suit, and therefore I am opposed to it.

Mr. DUBOIS. The amendment No. 118, now under consideration, was introduced by the distinguished Senator from Nevada, who is the father of all our mining laws. He understood the needs and wants of the mining country so well that when he was in the Senate, twenty years ago, he framed, you may say, all the mining laws which are now on the statute-books, which so fully and well protect the miners and the Government that there has scarcely been any amendment or change made in them by subsequent legislation in the various States or Territories. This amendment provides that persons living in the mining regions shall not be prosecuted for cutting and using for mining and domestic purposes timber which is not fit for any other use, which can not be used for lumber or for commercial purposes. This amendment can do no harm to any one either in the present or in the future. There are some gentlemen on this floor who have become so used to defending the poor farmer and agriculturist that they seem to forget every other class of people.

Now, I can say this to them, that in my country but for the miners there would be no farmers. Take the Wood River country, so called, in Idaho, for an illustration, which was founded in 1880, where now there are several towns of two or three thousand people. In 1880 there was scarcely a person located there. There were no farmers. We had magnificent prairie land, the Camas prairie and other fruitful valleys near by, with scarcely a settler upon them. I traveled over Camas prairie in 1882, and there were hardly a dozen people upon it. Now, since the large number of mines which have been discovered there yield an enormous and ever-increasing supply of precious metal that prairie is covered with farms and ranches. The farmers are absolutely dependent upon a home market for their products. They live so far from the markets of the world that they can not ship, and they must sell what they raise at home. The mines bring persons to engage in mercantile business and all other businesses, and the people are supplied by the farmers who would not be there if it were not for the mines. There has never been a protest from any farmer in those countries against the miners using this class of timber. I am safe in asserting that the Commissioner of the General Land Office has not a protest from any rancher or farmer in my Territory, and they would be very quick to resent any infringement on their rights and any violation of the law detrimental to their interests. Their prosperity and that of the miners goes hand in hand, and they do not sanction depriving miners of timber which would never be used at all unless by and through miners.

They do not complain that they are being deprived of timber they want for their own use. The complaints come from those who do not understand the situation. The agents who go out there representing the Government have been very zealous in late years, and much trouble has come from their over zeal.

My attention was attracted to a case in my own Territory, in which a special agent who is now in the service arrested the officers of the Ketcham Smelting Company, the majority of whom are residents of Philadelphia, found indictments against them criminally, and prosecuted them for some $18,000 or $20,000 for using timber unlawfully. The case was so flagrant that I went before Secretary Lamar with it, fortified with a strong letter from the governor of my Territory, who is a Democrat and who has lived there for twenty years, and who takes as much interest in the Territory as any man in it. I went to Secretary Lamar with the facts, and showed him that this timber was a species of pine called lodge pole or black pine, which seldom grew to be more than 8 inches in diameter.

After understanding the facts he dismissed the suit and issued an order that hereafter that species of timber should be excepted from their rulings. Now, we could go through the same formula with other cases in the courts. They can not get a judgment against us on the facts, and it simply harasses and worries those engaged in mining and does no good to any one. The gentleman from Nevada went into the law very carefully. I do wish to protest against the rejection of this amendment in behalf of the Territory which I represent. I know nothing about these companies in Nevada which are spoken of and can say nothing of them specially, but I am speaking of facts which are general and palpable in all of our Territories.

Mr. WOODBURN. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for eight minutes, after which the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Speaker, I think the Senate amendment ought to be adopted, because I think the cutting of the timber arises out of this state of case. In the appropriation bill of 1878 the right was given to cut timber of certain kinds on unsurveyed lands for domestic purposes, etc. Again, by an act passed June 30, 1878, it was made lawful to cut timber on mineral lands for mining and domestic purposes. There is no violation of the law under the act of 1878 in cutting such timber unless it is exported out of the State or Territory.

Now I imagine, Mr. Speaker, that these prosecutions have grown out of the fact that in the vicinity of these large mining camps in Nevada there is no timber, properly speaking, but the soil is composed of arid sand hills and deserts, and has, covering it, certain kinds of scrub wood which grows a few feet from the ground and then curls around, but which may be chopped and used by the miners for fuel to keep them warm in winter and from which the mining camps can make a certain amount of charcoal for the purpose of running their furnaces. Now they have a perfect right to cut this wood where it is found to be upon mineral lands, but I have no doubt (I do not know as a matter of fact) that these prosecutions have arisen from the cutting of timber on other than mineral lands.

I can not see how the prosecutions in Nevada which have lately arisen on the reports of timber agents could have been instituted unless the fact is that certain portions of those lands have been surveyed, and therefore have not been returned as mineral lands. When this timber was cut, or rather this wood, for you can not call it timber; it is not timber under any ruling that has ever been made by the Department or by a court—when this wood was cut, the lands upon which it was cut were probably supposed by these miners and these mining companies and their employés to be mineral lands. It was generally understood that the whole of that part of the State of Nevada was mineral land, and the men cutting this timber would not be very likely to know just when they crossed the line which the surveyor-general or a deputy surveyor had drawn between mineral and non-mineral lands. Probably they did not stop to inquire. Nobody ever objected. No Government agent ever notified them that they had not the right to cut this so-called timber which was curling up over the ground, something in the nature of underbrush or scrub-wood, and they did cut it on non-mineral lands as well as on mineral lands, and therefore they are now prosecuted for that timber which they cut and made into charcoal to be used by the miners of these mining camps for smelting their ores.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that is about the sum and substance of the whole matter, and hence I think that the Senate amendment ought to be adopted. The Senate amendment does not prevent prosecutions where the timber has been cut for commercial purposes or is commercial timber. It is a notorious fact, which I am informed is indisputable, that at the town of Eureka, in Nevada, and at other large mining towns there, they have to import from California or adjoining States and Territories all the timber which they use—everything that can be dignified by the name of "timber" and classified as coming from timber lands.

Mr. WOODBURN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SYMES. As the gentleman from Nevada says, there is no doubt about that. Now, the House ought to understand these facts, because this amendment goes to the relief of people who have been prosecuted for cutting timber under such circumstances in the State of Nevada, and I submit that it ought to be adopted.

Mr. WOODBURN. If the gentleman will permit me a suggestion at this point, all the timber that is used on the Comstock lode in the extraction of the ore from the mine, and all that is used by the eleven or twelve thousand people in Carson City, comes from the State of California.

Mr. SYMES. That is what I have stated, that the timber used in the towns and all the principal mining camps is brought from California. That is a fact that I have been familiar with for years.

One word in conclusion. This timber, or rather this wood, for it is not timber, having during a course of years been cut away in the way I have stated and used for domestic purposes, no agent of the Government having gone to that country and notified those persons that they were not entitled to cut a particular strip of this scrub timber, although by surveys thereafter made it may have turned out not to be or may have been known at the time not to be upon mineral lands, it can not benefit that community to have these parties prosecuted now; and it can not benefit the Government to expend money in prosecuting them for cutting this scrub wood from the surface of those arid hills, which can never be made of service in any other way.

Therefore I ask that the Senate amendment be adopted. I do not think the amendment offered by my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] would enable these prosecutions to be carried on. I have expressed and now express my opinion as a lawyer that if such an amendment were adopted not one prosecution of this kind could be carried on for cutting any of this timber in the State of Nevada or elsewhere. I think the Senate amendment ought to be adopted without being modified by the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, for the reason that the amendment may afford opportunity for lawyers to quibble, for agents to get up prosecutions, and for United States officers to make fees, while those prosecutions, in my judgment, would end in the Government paying the costs.

Mr. FELTON. Does not the law now make it the duty of the registers and receivers of the land offices to report any violations of law?

Mr. SYMES. Yes, I suppose that is true.

Mr. FELTON. That being true, there is no necessity of an espionage by private detectives.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURNES. I yield a few minutes to my colleague [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN] alluded to me as having some personal knowledge with reference to this question. I was a resident of Nevada for several years, and I know the importance to the miners of that section as well as to others who settle there of the privilege of using this scrub timber for fuel and for mining purposes. Indeed, sir, when I was in Nevada in the winter of 1859, I felt this need very sensibly, for we had then a very severe winter; the snow was 5, 6, or 8 feet deep, and but for the fact that we were permitted to use this timber, four or five thousand people probably would have suffered very greatly. It is impossible to settle those mining countries unless some privileges of this character are given.

A great deal of this timber, in Nevada especially, is what they call sage brush. The mahogany is simply a scrub manzanita-brush; the pine is simply a scrub pine. None of it would be put to any use in our Western States and Territories generally, except to be put in a brush-heap and burned up to get it out of the way. Now, the law which permitted the use of this timber in the mining regions contemplated, I suppose, that the miners and settlers going into that country should, when they located in any particular neighborhood, have the right to use this timber for fuel and for mining, wherever it was suitable for mining purposes, though very little of it is suitable for that. But the law is a little vague and uncertain. Hence we have difficulty in these prosecutions. Section 1 provides that citizens and bona fide residents may cut timber off of mineral lands in certain States and Territories, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide for the protection of the timber, etc.

Now, I understand the difficulty is that parties in Nevada, and especially these persons and corporations against whom these prosecutions are proposed to be brought, or have already been brought, have not conformed themselves to the true spirit of this statute. In my view the law ought to have been clearer. It ought to have confined the miner and the local community to the use of the timber within that community. It should not have permitted persons to go all over the State or Territory and denude of their timber districts where there were not yet settlements. The law is vague and uncertain; and it seems to me that a fair construction of it would allow any citizen of Nevada or any of the Territories to go anywhere within the State or Territory, cut down this timber and ship it to any other point, thus depriving the local community of the timber.

Now, the amendment I have offered has in view a remedy in this respect. The proposition may be considered an amendment to the existing law. It proposes to confine the right of the local community or the miner to the timber in the particular neighborhood, and prohibits persons or corporations from cutting timber in unsettled regions and transporting it to other portions of the State or Territory. A region may be unsettled, may be in a wild condition, yet it may have good lands and good mines, as will be discovered in the future. But when the discovery is made, lo and behold, the timber which it would be desirable to use in that neighborhood has all been removed, and removed to distant portions of the State or Territory. I say that is the difficulty under the vague condition of the law. My friend from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN] and my friend from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] are not anxious to have my amendment adopted. Why? They would rather risk these prosecutions under the law as it exists than have the law made definite so as to confine this privilege as to cutting timber to the local community; for under the law as it exists, it is questionable whether a citizen of one of these States or Territories may not have the right to go upon land in any portion of that State or Territory, whether inhabited or not, and for speculative purposes denude that land of its timber. It seems to me the law, on a fair construction of it, does permit this. But whether it does or not, my amendment does not interfere with any proper construction of it. It simply provides that the prosecutions may go on except in cases where miners, individuals, or corporations have used the timber for their local or domestic purposes, and not for purposes of removing it for speculation; where they have not gone out of their own vicinity and neighborhood to distant portions of the State and cut timber for speculative purposes and transported it for sale in other parts of either of these States and Territories. If they have done so, then the prosecutions can go on under the amendment. It protects the miners from the prosecutions which they now apprehend by making explicit that about which there can be any question. So that I claim the amendment I have offered is in the line of the recommendations of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, if I understand it.

I understand that he proposes to protect the local community or the miner by preventing the destruction of timber for the benefit of other localities; and hence it is not in conflict with his recommendations or his idea that the suits are to be instituted, but places an amendment, so to speak, upon the law, and a direction in this respect that the prosecutions may still go on in all cases except where the miners have used the timber in good faith for their own immediate purposes under the existing statute.

I know these people, and I am aware of the fact that they are excited upon the question, and probably they are misinformed as to the true state of the case, as well as the true intention of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The miners are, no doubt, led to believe that they are all to be prosecuted for trespasses dating back years and years, for timber cut in years past, and for every stick of timber cut for domestic uses and mining purposes, which is not true; and if the amendment is adopted the amendment as it comes from the Senate will do no harm to prevent prosecutions of future infractions of the law, and will confine prosecutions to the law as it ought to be construed, and to what was no doubt originally intended. This amendment, therefore, is directly in the interest of the local communities and of the miners, and more in the line of the suggestion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office than the present law, for it enables him to carry out the policy he has entered upon in that regard. It disabuses the minds of these people of the idea that Congress intends to go and prosecute them regardless of the miners or locators in these different Territories and States and bring them hundreds of miles from their homes to be tried for exercising a right that the law seems to give them, or which it appears it was intended they should exercise.

Mr. FELTON. And which they are now doing.

Mr. BLAND. I have no doubt from what I have read concerning this matter that speculators have gone on the lands in a way that was not contemplated by the law. But whether they have or have not done so the amendment I have offered will prevent it in future and will be an explanatory provision of the law which they can not misunderstand, because it will be specific and is not subject to misinterpretation, that the particular timber shall be used in a locality where the timber is grown; and that a citizen in that particular neighborhood or locality shall not have the right to go into some other State or Territory at a distant point, denude the country, and prevent coming settlers from getting the benefit of it.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I can not accept the remarks made by gentlemen either upon the right or the left as applicable to the issue now pending before the House. The question is something very different from that which gentlemen have assumed it to be. They have discussed the merits and the demerits, the efficacy and the inefficiency of the law of June 3, 1878, as if we were proposing to legislate with respect thereto on this general appropriation bill. The amendment of the Senate is placed upon the House bill, and is now urged upon us by the Senate conferees with full knowledge that its principal, if not only, object is to effect the dismissal of various suits of law instituted and to be instituted by the law officers of the Government against six or seven of the great mining corporations of Nevada for timber cut on public lands of the United States and converted to their own use, amounting to the handsome sum of $10,000,000. This being the issue, let us consider it in its nakedness and view it in all its deformity.

The House bill as sent to the Senate contained the following provision:

For expenses of depositing public moneys received from the disposal of public lands, $10,000.

This was the innocent and harmless little provision upon which the Senate drafted its rider, without kinship or parliamentary connection, and obnoxious to the rules of the Senate, as well as of this House, prohibiting legislation on appropriation bills.

Upon that provision, relating only to the transportation of certain public moneys of the United States, the Senate amendment now under consideration is before you, and was before us in conference, as follows:

No part of the money appropriated by this act—

Not this provision, mark you, but no part of the money appropriated by this entire bill—shall be used in the investigation of any case—

Observe, Mr. Speaker, the audacious proposition, that investigation must cease, and in every case, too—or in the prosecution of any person in the mining regions of the United States, for cutting for mining or domestic purposes dwarf or scrub timber unfit to be sawed or hewed into timber of commercial value.

Much as this amendment is out of place on the particular provision of the bill just read, and foreign as it is to the subject-matter it pretends to amend, its object and intention are plain. Examinations and investigations by sworn officers of the law as to the wholesale depredations upon the timber lands of the United States in Nevada by rich and powerful mining companies are putting the latter to some trouble and expense, and causing some anxiety lest the facts when ascertained may develop a system of unparalleled wholesale robbery and lead to retributive justice upon the wrong-doers. Therefore the first proposition of the amendment is to stop these investigations. Somebody may get hurt if the Interior Department is allowed to go on with them, and hence to save wounds upon men and things in Nevada investigations, say the Senate, must cease at once!

The second proposition of the Senate amendment is, that certain suits pending and in contemplation and certain criminal prosecutions shall cease and be no further prosecuted by the Government. True, the Government is already in possession of evidence from official sources that $10,000,000 of Government property has been seized and carried away by certain named law-breaking managers and owners of mining corporations, but as it might embarrass their business and throw their agents and employés out of employment, the Senate seem to realize with persistent determination that no suits or prosecutions shall be continued.

To understand the nature of these suits and proceedings the law upon which they are based may be profitably considered.

The following is the much-violated statute of June 3, 1878:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That all citizens of the United States, bona fide residents of the State of Colorado or Nevada, or either of the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Wyoming, Dakota, Idaho, or Montana, and all other mineral districts of the United States, shall be, and are hereby, authorized and permitted to fell and remove for building, agricultural, mining, or other domestic purposes, any timber or other trees growing or being upon the public lands, said lands being mineral and not subject to entry under existing laws of the United States, except for mineral entry, in either of said States, Territories, or districts of which said citizens or persons may be at the time bona fide residents, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe for the protection of the timber and of the undergrowth growing upon such lands, and for other purposes: Provided, The provisions of this act shall not extend to railroad corporations.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the register and receiver of any local land office in whose district any mineral land may be situated to ascertain from time to time whether any timber is being cut or used upon any such lands, except for the purposes authorized by this act, within their respective land districts; and, if so, they shall immediately notify the Commissioner of the General Land Office of that fact; and all necessary expenses incurred in making such examinations shall be paid and allowed such register and receiver in making up their next quarterly accounts.

SEC. 3. Any person or persons who shall violate the provisions of this act, or any rules or regulations in pursuance thereof made by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor; and, upon conviction, shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $500, and to which may be added an imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

In pursuance of this statute the Secretaries of the Interior—commencing with Secretary Schurz and continuing with slight amendments and additions to the present day—have established and prescribed rules and regulations for the protection of the timber and the undergrowth growing upon such lands, and some of these are as follows:

1. All citizens and bona fide residents of the States and Territories mentioned therein are authorized to fell and remove, or employ others to fell and remove, or to purchase from others who fell and remove any timber growing or being upon the public mineral lands in said States or Territories: Provided, a, that the same is not for export from the State or Territory where cut; b, that no timber less than 8 inches in diameter is cut or removed; c, that it is not wantonly wasted or destroyed.

In addition to the liberal license thus given by law and regulation, the instructions of the Department to Government timber agents, showing the utmost tenderness towards those who honestly and fairly use the growing timber, are appended as follows:

INSTRUCTIONS TO SPECIAL TIMBER AGENTS.

[Object of protecting timber upon Government land.]

3. The object of the Government in endeavoring to prevent the waste and destruction of public timber is primarily to preserve it for the wants of future generations, having, of course, due regard for the requirements of the present. The result of the destruction of forests in permitting a more rapid melting of the snows in spring than would occur in the same region if well sheltered, and in decreasing the capacity of the soil to retain moisture after rains—in both cases increasing the liability to sudden and devastating floods, not only in the denuded sections, but sometimes hundreds of miles distant—also the well-established climatic influence of such destruction in diminishing the annual rainfall to the serious detriment of regions already subject to frequent droughts, are other reasons which render the preservation of the public timber a matter of vital importance not only to the agricultural but to many other extensive interests.

* * * * * * *

44. Special timber agents should remember that it is not the purpose of the law, nor of the regulations of this Department, to prohibit the use of so much of the public timber as may be actually needed by bona fide settlers for agricultural and domestic purposes, but to prevent its being made an article of speculation for the pecuniary gain of a few individuals to the detriment of the many, or from being wantonly wasted or destroyed. When an agent understands this and convinces the people in the district to which he is assigned that such is the case, he will find no difficulty in securing their active support and co-operation.

* * * * * * *

50. It is not the object of the Government to persecute poor wood-choppers, or cutters who are employed or induced to fell or remove the timber for others who are to reap the profits therefrom; but to punish the principals therein, or the parties to be directly benefited in the case, they being the more guilty parties.

51. Care should be taken to ascertain whether the alleged trespasser has any right or authority to take such timber as specified under heads of "Homestead or pre-emption entry," "Right of railroad companies, etc.," and "Mineral lands." (Pages 6 to 11.)

* * * * * * *

53. Having all the facts in your possession you should (see section 3, circular of May 27, 1885) at once fill out a form of report (in duplicate) and transmit the same to this office, being particular to state the facts in full under each head, and in accordance with instructions given under the head of "Manner of making reports of timber trespass."

You should call upon the trespasser in every instance where practicable, and request him to state his side of the case, under oath.

In bold and defiant disregard of the law and regulations cited, it is understood that certain mining corporations have systematically cut or had cut and used for their own gain all the timber, regardless of age, size, or quality, growing upon lands adjacent to their mines; and not satisfied with that have carried their work of sacrifice and destruction over vast areas of the public lands which are tributary to other mines, and naturally belonging to the millions of the future who are to open and work those other mines yet hidden from mortal eyes. The Department seems to have forborne hasty prosecutions, but the Secretary and the Commissioner of the General Land Office have been vigilant in thorough investigation. The official reports of the reliable agents of the Government soon advised them of the extended frauds that had been committed, and the United States attorney of the State of Nevada joined in bearing testimony to them. His letter of April 28, 1887, to the Secretary and the Commissioner is so creditable to himself and so courageous and patriotic in view of his surroundings that I send it to the Clerk to be read.

RENO, NEV., April 28, 1887.

DEAR SIRS: As the subject of this communication falls within scope of your circular of date May 7, 1886, to registers and receivers of United States land offices and special agents of General Land Office, issued by honorable Commissioner and approved by honorable Secretary, and is of importance to the Department as well as to the General Land Office, I trust will prove a sufficient excuse for making this communication a joint one. As you are doubtless aware, I have been appointed recently, and on 4th instant qualified as attorney for United States of district of Nevada. Complaints have been made to United States Marshal Thomas E. Kelly, of this district, and to myself, as district attorney, within a few days past, that for years past and still continuing, hundreds of men, mostly Italians, may be thousands of them, have been systematically engaged in cutting off into cordwood or burning into charcoal thousands of acres of timber on land belonging to the Government without even the pretense of pre-empting it or buying it from either State or United States.

In the region about Eureka, in this State, alone there has probably been several hundred square miles of land covered with a growth of nut-pine timber from 8 to 10 inches in diameter to 30, and from 8 or 10 feet to 30 feet in height, and with cedar considerably less in diameter and height, have been swept bare, and probably one or two million cords of wood have thus been taken off of public land, and mostly consisting of mineral land, without any color or pretense of right to the same, all, too, for purposes of commerce, not by miners for their mines, or for improvements on the land. In a district of mineral land 30 to 40 miles away from Eureka, and outside of the mining district that embraced Eureka, on or near the Eureka and Palisade Railroad, at or near what is called Pine Station, Alpha Antelope mining district, Cedar Station, etc., there are boss Italians, or leaders among their countrymen, who have grown quite rich on these peculations or rather wholesale robberies of the timber on the public lands.

That railroad is constantly engaged in carrying and in buying and selling this wood at Eureka and other points, all directly contrary to the act of June 3, 1878, referred to by you in your circular above referred to, and contrary also to section 4 of act of same date, providing for sale of timber land in Nevada, etc. (pages 89 and 90, 20 Statutes at Large).

C. Boltiere has now five hundred cords cut, Gabriel Zonola, at Alpha, over one thousand cords, and eight or ten other leading men have considerable amounts. The Eureka and Palisade Narrow Gauge Railroad is engaged in hauling it in their cars every day. This wood last spoken of—four-fifths of it—is not over 5 inches in diameter, and scarce one tree out of fifty is over 8 inches in diameter. The fac is, all that land was culled and cut over once, taking all trees of any size, and now they are cutting it over a second time and sweeping every young tree and bush over 2 or 3 inches in diameter.

These men have all been notified by men owning mines right among this timber to desist from cutting it; told if they would leave what was standing and haul off only that already cut they would not be complained of. The railroad company aforesaid has been notified to desist hauling the wood thus cut, but the parties thus complaining have been treated with contempt.

This information I have from a mining man, the president and superintendent of several mines in the immediate vicinity of this timber land. His motive, of course, is to preserve the timber for the lawful purposes provided for by the acts above referred to, namely, for purchase and for mining and domestic purposes, etc., as permitted by the act. He is verified in his statements by the observation of the marshal, Thomas E. Kelly, who has been very recently, namely, within ten days or so last past, through this country. In fact, the same state of facts, of my own knowledge, will be found to exist in the vicinity of Austin, White Pine, Belmont, Pioche, and every other large mining camp in this State, and throughout all the mountainous timbered regions of California where examples have not been made.

I have no doubt that many thousand cords of wood could now be found and seized in various parts of this State cut off of mineral land reserved from sale and public land not sold. I have no doubt this state of affairs will continue unless examples are made. I have no doubt large recoveries could be made from persons taken red-handed in the act. I have no doubt the former register and receiver of the Eureka land office must have known or shut his eyes and ears to keep from knowing about this wholesale robbery of the timber of the United States out in the eastern part of the State. There is but little timber of any kind near Carson, east of California State line, except what was fairly purchased, or at least pre-empted or purchased, by men who appeared to have fairly pre-empted or purchased such timber bona fide.

These complaints have only come to my ears since I have been officiating as United States district attorney; yet I feel they are true or far less than the truth, and that any honest, capable investigation will demonstrate the entire truth of all that has been said. The General Land Office has been promising in one or two cases I know of to send out a special agent to investigate land irregularities in this State.

To develop the amount of these timber spoliations, to recoup what can be done would require a smart, quick, active agent with largely developed detective faculties to go around these several mining districts and ascertain approximately what amount of timber or wood has been stolen, who stole it, what witnesses can prove it, and then, like a thunderbolt, make or have made his arrests and seizures of wood and timber remaining, and inaugurate suits to recover values from all solvent persons and corporations.

I would do all in an individual's power to prosecute, convict, and punish those bold robbers of the public domain, but without the direction and assistance of the proper Department—its influence, direction, and means at our back—we can do but little and might be blamed for that, both by the Government on account of the expense incurred, and the citizens and communities affected.

So, gentlemen, we most respectfully refer these matters to you. If you think these people ought to be prosecuted for laying waste the small amount of not very high or very thick timber in this State, and that acts of Congress should be enforced, then send a special agent, or appoint one here (to the manner born) to investigate these charges, to marshal the evidence, array the witnesses. I can put him on track in some cases, refer him to persons and their residences that will take warm interest in giving him all the information and assistance in their power.

If you do not think that course advisable, please inform me of your views and wishes in the premises.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

THOS. HAYDON,
United States District Attorney for Nevada.

Hon. L. Q. C. LAMAR,
Secretary Interior, and
Hon. WILLIAM A. J. SPARKS,
Commissioner General Land Office.

Mr. BURNES. Several months elapsed without any action being taken in response to this letter, and no special agent was sent to Nevada because of the limited or insufficient appropriations for the service. Mr. Haydon, the attorney of the United States before mentioned, had satisfied himself beyond doubt that great robberies had been perpetrated, and receiving no orders to proceed to recoveries due the United States, addressed rather an impatient letter to Solicitor McCue, which I ask the Clerk to read from the desk.

RENO, NEV., July 27, 1887.

SIR: Some two months or more since I wrote a long letter conjointly to the Hons. Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, informing them of a wholesale despoliation of timber on the public lands of one mineral district in this State, much of which was of timber less than 8 inches in diameter, for firewood for sale and as a matter of commerce, to inhabitants of Eureka out of said mining district where cut, to the amount of several thousand cords. Told them the same practice was common to all the mining towns and camps in this State, requested them to appoint a special agent of the Land Office to look into and investigate the matter, prepare the evidence, and bring the guilty parties to justice.

I was induced to write a joint letter because the Commissioner had issued a circular to the register and receiver of the land offices in the State calling upon them to investigate such cases, etc.

Without entering into particulars it is notorious in this State that a wholesale robbery of the public lands here of their timber is indulged in, in every mining section of the State wherever cutting, hauling, and transporting such wood will pay a profit to the individual, without regard to the rights of the Government and the protests of individuals interested in the mining districts where such timber is found. I have had complaints from three different, widely separate mining districts of such trespasses.

Railroads make a business of carrying such wood and selling it, even against the notification and protests of miners in such districts.

The honorable Commissioner of the General Land Office and Secretary of the Interior have not even had the courtesy to notice my communication.

I read an injunction to communicate such matters to you, in search of the duties of my office, and therefore this.

Very respectfully,

THOMAS HAYDON.
United States District Attorney for Nevada.

Hon. A. MCCUE,
Solicitor of the Treasury of the United States, Washington, D. C.

The reply of Commissioner Stockslager is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., August 17, 1887.

SIR: I have received, by reference from the Solicitor of the Treasury, your letter of the 27th ultimo, relative to timber trespass upon the public lands in Nevada, and commenting upon the fact that there had not been accorded any reply to a previous letter upon the same subject addressed by you to the Secretary of the Interior and to the Commissioner of this office conjointly.

The delay in replying to the letter, which was referred to this office by the Secretary, arose from the impracticability of appointing a special timber agent at that time for duty in Nevada, owing to the insufficiency of the appropriation for the protection of the public timber. At an early day, however, arrangements will doubtless be made whereby an agent may be assigned to the service in your State.

Your communications upon the subject have been fully appreciated and considered, and the interest thereby manifested for the protection of the public timber is truly gratifying, betokening as it does a spirit of co-operation with the efforts of this Department towards accomplishing that end.

Very respectfully,

S. M. STOCKSLAGER,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. THOMAS HAYDON,
United States Attorney, Reno, Nev.

Mr. BURNES. I have had this correspondence read for the purpose of showing that the Commissioner of the Land Office took no step hastily or prematurely, but when he was thoroughly convinced that the law and regulations had been grossly violated, that thousands of acres of the public land had been ruthlessly denuded of all its timber by a few corporations (mining and railroad), he caused legal proceedings to be commenced. These proceedings are the cause of this Senate amendment. It has been urged that the prosecutions instituted will carry dismay to the poor people of Nevada. What criminal prosecutions, if any, were begun in that State against wood-choppers were brought by officials of the Department of Justice, and not because of the labors of any special agent of the General Land Office, because no such special agent was then in the State.

There is neither suit nor prosecution begun or to be begun against any poor or laboring man who has taken only what timber he wanted for his uses, or who, as employé, has cut timber for the corporations sued. The Government is after the principals in the transactions, not their agents or employés; after wholesale plunderers, not their victims or tools.

Wherever bona fide citizens have taken timber for their domestic uses, for buildings, fences, firewood, or any other object in their daily lives and labors, no inquiry even has been entered upon; but the corporations which have been sued for $10,000,000 worth are the strong and influential creatures whom the Government will legally chastise to a fair settlement and a final judgment, unless Congress shall interfere with the course of justice. Recognizing their guilt, and virtually acknowledging it, they appeal to Congress for a change of the law they have transgressed, and for a practical dismissal of suits which they are conscious must be sustained.

The law, they suddenly find, is very wrong. They tell us it needs amending, and needs it instantly.

They can not wait the ordinary methods nor allow the proper committee, that on Public Lands, to investigate and report the subject. Oh, no; the most expeditious route, that by way of a Senatorial rider upon a general appropriation bill, has been selected. Time is important to them; they can not wait. Delays, always dangerous, are doubly so when evil-doers would hide away from the officers of the law and the processes of the courts, or stop both of them. The law was wise, liberal, and good when they were taking the public property without conscience or remorse, but when they were detected and exposed it became very intolerable and bad. The familiar distich may not be inappropriate:

No rogue e'er felt the halter draw
With good opinion of the law.

Mr. Speaker, with a couple of incidents somewhat connected with this discussion I shall reach a conclusion.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I will ask my colleague whether it is not a fact that the defendants in some of these cases have offered to compromise?

Mr. BURNES. In reply to my friend and colleague [Mr. STONE], I answer his interrogatory emphatically in the affirmative. One of the pending prosecutions is for the recovery of $126,880.94. The defendants made overtures for a compromise, and finally submitted an offer to pay $3,000 for a release and acquittance. Three thousand dollars for $126,880.94 of Government property! The offer was of course rejected by the faithful representative of our Government, but not until such offer had received the following eminent indorsement, which I send to the desk to be read.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 27, 1888.

I, WILLIAM M. STEWART, Senator of the United States from the State of Nevada, do hereby certify that I am personally acquainted with G. W. Baker and J. W. Dorsey, the attorneys representing the parties herein named, and also with George W. Peltier and W. C. Price, comprising the firm of G. W. Peltier & Co., and also with the mining corporations mentioned in this proposition of settlement and the mining claims and mining operations carried on by each of them respectively in the Tuscarora mining district, county of Elko and State of Nevada.

That I have visited Tuscarora and am familiar with the character of the wood and fuel consumed by said mining companies, and am satisfied that the representations herein contained are candid and truthful, and fully and fairly present the volume and value of the wood and timber consumed by each of said companies, respectively; and, further, that the scattered and scrubby pine and cedar which is gathered in the region within a radius of more than 40 miles about Tuscarora never has been regarded as timber within the prohibition of the statutes. These scattered and scrubby bushes would never be used for any purpose if any other timber existed in that region, and besides there would be no necessity for using it if mines had not been discovered.

There would be very little of this scrubby stuff gathered from the crags of the mountains where it grows if only ordinary fire-wood was required; but it is necessary to have some hard wood to roast ores. The principal fuel, however, at Tuscarora, and which is consumed by the mining companies in carrying forward their operations, is sage-brush, which is gathered from the surrounding country. Under these circumstances I think that the offer of a compromise made is extremely liberal and should be accepted by the Government without hesitation, particularly in this case, where it would be extremely doubtful whether the Government would be able to make proof of the cutting of any wood (because it is a misnomer to call this scrubby stuff timber) or to establish any violation of the timber laws upon the part of any of the parties to this offer if they had put themselves upon the defensive and denied the commission of such trespass. Their frank admission and offer of settlement should insure for them fair treatment and prompt response on the part of the United States.

WM. M. STEWART.

Mr. BURNES. It will be observed that "the offer of a compromise made is extremely liberal and should be accepted by the Government without hesitation," in the opinion of the distinguished indorser whose official certificate has just been read. With all due consideration I am compelled to differ from this opinion, and believe that this House will concur in such difference, and sustain the firm and courageous efforts of the Commissioner of Lands to recover the just rights of the United States.

The other incident to which I am painfully constrained to call the attention of Congress and the country, arises from a recent attempt made elsewhere to compel the honorable Commissioner of the General Land Office, whilst engaged against able and wary foes in the prosecution of these important suits, to "show his hand"—borrowing an expressive phrase from one of the "lost arts"—to the adversaries of the Government, and make public, in advance of a trial, his whole case. That this attempt was only partially successful enables us to indulge a hope that there is yet power in this Government to pursue violaters of the law and bring them to justice, even when Congress is stoutly appealed to for intervention and release.

Mr. Speaker, concluding my remarks on this amendment, I beg to submit that it is an alien growth upon a constitutional appropriation bill; that it proposes to stop prosecutions and suits against confessed violators of our public law; that its purpose is to release to certain mining corporations $10,000,000 which they justly owe for public property of the United States, seized and converted to their own uses; that there is no purpose or intention of prosecuting, now or hereafter, any honest, bona fide citizen who obeys the law and takes only such timber as he needs in his own affairs; that six mining companies should not be allowed to discount the rights of posterity and consume their rightful heritage; that these six mines—all of Nevada, as they may be now—are not entitled to all the timber of the State growing upon undeveloped or undiscovered mines, in which hundreds of thousands of our people may be employed in the near future; that the arms of our faithful officials shall be upheld in their contests with freebooters for the just rights of the public; that honesty and not dishonesty shall be exempted from prosecution, and that, in the language of President Grant with regard to the whisky frauds of 1875, no guilty man shall escape.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BLAND. I withdraw the amendment which I sent up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN] that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The motion was disagreed to; there being ayes 17, noes 54.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The next amendment (amendment numbered 119) was read, as follows:

Insert the following:

"For the purpose of investigating the extent to which the arid region of the United States can be redeemed by irrigation, and the segregation of the irrigable lands in such arid region, and for the selection of sites for reservoirs and other hydraulic works necessary for the storage and utilization of water for irrigation and the prevention of floods and overflows, and to make the necessary maps, including the pay of employés in field and in office, the cost of all instruments, apparatus, and materials, and all other necessary expenses connected therewith, the work to be performed by the Geological Survey, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $250,000. And all the lands which may be designated for reservoirs and canals for irrigation shall be reserved as the property of the United States, and shall not be subjected to entry or settlement until hereafter provided for by law."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment, and agree to the same with the amendment which I send to the desk.

After the word "dollars," in line 1, on page 66, strike out the following:

"And all the lands which may be designated for reservoirs and canals for irrigation shall be reserved as the property of the United States, and shall not be subjected to entry or settlement until hereafter provided for by law."

And insert in lieu thereof:

"And the Director of the Geological Survey under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior shall make a report to Congress on the first Monday in December of each year, showing in detail how the said money has been expended, the amount used for actual survey and engineer work in the field in locating sites for reservoirs, and an itemized account of the expenditures under this appropriation; and all the lands which may hereafter be designated or selected by such United States surveys for sites for reservoirs, ditches, or canals for irrigation purposes and all the lands made susceptible of irrigation by such reservoirs, ditches, or canals, are from this time henceforth hereby reserved from sale as the property of the United States and shall not be subject after the passage of this act to entry, settlement, or occupation until further provided by law."

Mr. FORNEY. I would like to come to some agreement as to the length of time to be occupied in the discussion on this proposition.

Mr. HERBERT. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to fix a limit now. This is too important a question.

[Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have sought five minutes for the purpose of making a short reply to one point presented by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], to wit, the effect that the retention of the waters that come into the Mississippi River from the Rocky Mountains would have in reducing the floods of that river. We have had and now have the question presented by this amendment under consideration in the Committee on Agriculture, in a bill which I now hold in my hand referred to that committee. Major Powell, Director of the Geological Survey, appeared before that committee and made a statement on the subject covered by the amendment. When he had concluded his general statement he was specially and particularly interrogated as to the effect that the staying of these waters in the Rocky Mountains would have on the floods of the Mississippi. He could not say that it would have any perceptible effect, nor indeed can it. If any Representative whose constituents are affected by the floods of this river is disposed to vote for this amendment under the influence of the hope that they are to be benefited thereby I beg him to pause for he will find himself grievously mistaken. I beg such, if any there be, but to cast their eyes on the map there spread out before us, pursue the Missouri, the Yellowstone, and other rivers to the sources in the Rocky Mountains, in which their waters are to be held in reservoirs, and behold what an infinitesimally small acreage is to be subtracted from the enormous watershed drained by the Ohio River and its tributaries, the Mississippi and its tributaries, and all of the rivers flowing into the Mississippi from the West, where the rains fall east of the artificial lakes made in the coves of the Rocky Mountains.

Indeed, an argument made to those of us who represent constituents who suffer from these floods that we are to be benefited by such expenditures has rather a tendency to disclose the weakness of the entire scheme. It is certain that we are not to be benefited by this small subtraction.

But the question presented, on its intrinsic merits, is entitled to very grave consideration, and demands a very full and thorough investigation. It should not come up for consideration in an appropriation bill among a multitude of distracting dollar and cent items; nor should it have been submitted to the Committee on Agriculture for investigation, as has been done in the House. The question is one affecting the public domain, and should have separate consideration by the Committee on the Public Lands.

From the partial investigation that has been given to it by the Committee on Agriculture, of which I am a member, I am fully satisfied of this. It should be fully and thoroughly known before these expenditures are entered upon where these surveys and examinations are to be made and the duties of those in charge in some manner defined in the interest of the Government. Who can tell where these surveys and examinations are to be made? Are they to be made in the vicinity of the three great railroads, with their millions of acres of public lands derived as subsidies from the General Government, and who may be the principal beneficiary?

Where is the direction in the amendment prescribing any rule in this regard or in any manner indicating where the work shall begin or where it shall end? Are these surveys to be made where the lands have been surveyed by the Government and are open to sale or entry or are they to be made where the chain and compass have not yet been? Full information on all these subjects should be had before such important and costly legislation is entered upon. In order that the House may understand something of the obscurity in which we find ourselves moping along I will read a communication from the acting Commissioner of Public Lands:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1888.

SIR: I am in receipt of Senate resolution of February 13, 1888, requesting the honorable Secretary of the Interior to inform the Senate if, in his opinion, it is desirable to authorize the organization in his Department known as the Geological Survey to segregate lands of the public domain capable of irrigation in the sections of the United States where irrigation is required, from other lands, and to lay out suitable places to be reserved for reservoirs and rights of way for ditches and canals, for the purposes of irrigation. Said resolution was, on February 14, 1888, referred to this office for report in duplicate and return of papers, by Hon. D. L. Hawkins, Assistant Secretary.

At present I am not fully informed as to the extent and exact location of all lands the survey and segregation of which are contemplated by the resolution, nor have I definite means of ascertaining the expense attendant on such work, nor do I suppose that accurate information could be obtained as to these matters in time for the action of Congress at the present session. Whilst it may be desirable that legislation of the character contemplated by the resolution should be had in the future, at the present I am unable to see any urgent necessity for it.

Very respectfully,

S. M. STOCKSLAGER,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM F. VILAS,
Secretary of the Interior.

Now here is the statement of the Commissioner that he can not furnish us, for the want of information himself, with the extent or location of lands the survey and segregation of which are contemplated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I have no doubt in the world the Commissioner has no data.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi for a few minutes. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi be allowed to continue his remarks until he shall have concluded them.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I will give to the gentleman from Mississippi two minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks that the gentleman from Mississippi be allowed to continue his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I object. I have given him two minutes more.

Mr. MORGAN. I only desire a word further.

What great practical benefit is to be derived or emergency is pressing, that we can not wait until we can get all the information that is necessary to enable us to act advisedly about this matter? I am a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture in charge of the House bill covering this matter, and I stand prepared to report it back to this House with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, who have been selected by this House with regard to their special fitness to investigate matters of this kind.

[Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] has thirty-five minutes remaining. How much time does he yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES]?

Mr. SYMES. I take the floor in my own right.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], and reserve five.

[Mr. SYMES withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can add anything of a practical nature to this discussion. I may add something historical and otherwise, so that we may contemplate this matter in a better light, with a view to the future.

I favor the proposition of the honorable gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES]. It is judicious; it guards against corporate greed. Besides, I am in accord with the statesmanlike utterances of the distinguished member from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]. There is no necessity of comparing this experiment with some enormous scheme or plunder. It looks only toward information. It does not propose large sums. It does not foster a grand scheme. It would investigate. It would furnish discreet and intelligent data. It does not necessarily lead to the expenditure of millions, either for reservoirs or conduits. It looks toward the redemption of vast arid areas. It looks wisely to our aggrandizement as a people.

Why am I drawn into this debate? Because as a member from the great metropolis we welcome all measures of general wealth and welfare. I should, however, have remained silent, but for the quotation from my volume of "Winter Sunbeams."

There is a delicate compliment implied in the use of the paragraphs which have been read from it, relating some observations in Spain on the subject of irrigation. I thank the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] for renewing my interest in so interesting a theme. I can not exactly recall the authority for the data which have been quoted. I think they were taken from official records connected with the irrigation of the Spanish Peninsula. They certainly are entitled to emphasis in one regard. They come from a disinterested source, for they were written before there was any idea of applying the system of other countries to our own with reference to the cultivation of our own soil by irrigation.

It is a matter of felicitation, sir, that we have so large an area of territory. In one sense it is a burden. Our arid region is about 1,300,000 square miles. Of this, one-fifth is too rugged or too elevated for cultivation under any condition likely to arise within the next century. Another portion it is impossible to irrigate by reason of its flatness. We can not by any process of science or gravity wash the salts from its soil. A million of square miles, however, remain. These only require water to utilize them for agriculture.

In the report of Major Powell there are estimates as to the valuation of this land at the present Government price. There is also an estimate of its value when irrigated. This last estimate, in round numbers, approaches nearly two billions of money. It is more than our public debt.

The report to which I refer, and to which reference has been made, gives the range for the annual rain precipitation, and the amount of water needed for the crops during the growing season. It is both attractive as a matter of study, and may well inspire the hope of the ultimate reclamation of the greater part of our arid Western land.

Something has been done in this respect already by private and other enterprise. How these waters may be brought within control, how they may be stored, what percentage of the lands may be redeemed, and how much wealth may in the end be added to that of the nation by this project, is set forth in figures, not of rhetoric, but of arithmetic, together with the plans by which this immense rescue of our lands may be made.

The experience of other nations shows that such reclamation is not only possible but feasible. Irrigation is no new science or art. It is as old as the Bible. It is as old as Egypt. The canalization, of which remains are still found west of the Mississippi, attest that our prehistoric race may have been engaged in cultivating the soil through irrigation. But whether the waters of the Mississippi were canalized merely for the purposes of cultivation or to prevent the overflow of the Mississippi itself in its lower valley I do not pretend to determine. I have given it no study. But I remember one verse of the Bible where it is said—I think in the Psalms—that "the Lord divided the water courses to prevent the overflow thereof."

And doubtless in early days, as in modern times, in those Oriental countries the streams from the uplands were so divided as well to fructify the soil and make the waste places beautiful and useful by production as to prevent the terrible distresses of inundation.

Three things are necessary to production from the soil—the earth, the sun, and the water. Without water the others are but idle factors. Given water and there is no limit to what the French call "the energy of vegetation."

I may be pardoned for referring to observations in Scandinavia, where the vegetable energy is so great and so notable that the barley and the pease grow 2 or 3 inches per day during the brief season, and where ten weeks is the average to get the grain crops in and out of the soil in the summer. It is because of the forests of Norway and the rainfall of that Arctic country that the immense trees, birch, juniper, elm, and pine, grow so abundantly to enrich its commerce and give employment to its people.

Nowhere have I seen such fields of flowers as in the Scandinavian summer. The very rocks amaze you with their efflorescence and beauty.

But all these may lie flowerless and fruitless unless the energy of man seizes upon them for development. Paul may plant, but you have to call in Apollos to water, and then God will give the increase. Then that increase will give vales of Tempe as beautiful as those of ancient Greece and fields as opulent as those of Egypt.

The Oriental people believed in water. It was a part of their creed. It was a part of their religion. It was with them the great principle of life. They believed in water as they believed in purity of life, of which water was the symbol. They believed in it as they believed in "Allah." Go to the city where I lived for awhile—Constantinople. The first thing that strikes the beholder are the fountains erected by the old Sultans. They pervade the city. These prescripts from the Koran are gilded upon their marble fronts: "Water is the element of Being;" "Water from the wells of Paradise;" "Water is Purity;" "Water gives bread," etc. "Water, water everywhere," was the Koranic idea. "Water, water everywhere," and, by the canon of Mahomet, "not a drop to drink." [Laughter.] That was Mahometan prohibition!

Why, Mr. Speaker, we have twelve hundred thousand square miles of land in this country utterly arid. They are useless for any purpose unless we reclaim them. Seventy-four millions of acres in New Mexico alone and 70,000,000 in Arizona to be reclaimed by some system in the future. Shall we begin by obtaining further information? Why not collect under this amendment all the necessary points on which to base future action? I do not know or care so much how much money this will take. Let us begin the work. Begin it by giving us the information. That will not be expensive. I would not enter upon the debate as to the expediency of an expenditure for a large and a magnificent scheme for the purpose of making these reservoirs and other adjuncts to irrigation. That is not in question. We can not do as other countries have done.

We may not do as old Spain did under its government. We could not under our system. But to rescue these waste lands from the greed of corporations, and to rescue them in time and before it is too late, I would make timely investigation, with a view to provident and practical action.

There is one thing, sir, that struck me more than anything else during all my various vagaries of travel. This was the remarkable similarity between old Spain and New Spain, as we used to call California and Mexico. There is the same arid plain, the same serrated mountain, the same remarkable development connected with the same volcanic strata, the same general contour and appearance. We have within our boundaries an identical picture of old Spain. The same ideas and system came from old Spain to Spanish America. It is the same system that was brought by the Moors from Bagdad and Damascus—from the Orient—to Spain. It was thence transferred to our continent.

The system of irrigation which made certain portions of Spain so fruitful was brought to that country by the Moors. The cities of Damascus and Bagdad, like other cities of the East, old and new, fabricated with their silver threads their large belts of greenery by the aid of irrigation from the mountains.

I once visited the city of Avignon, and was the guest of John Stuart Mill. I had been through Spain and Northern Africa. He asked me, "What strikes you as the most conspicuous among the marvels of those lands?" I said, "The system of irrigation." We walked down his beautiful arbor and crossed the road, and he pointed out the remnants of that irrigation which the Moors in their movements toward the west of Europe, and as far up into France as Avignon, had left of their system. He had no praise too eulogistic for the men whose system of civilization had been praised by our own Draper and glorified by a code of literature upon the subject of irrigation which is both ample, instructive, and unrivaled in the history of progressive humanity.

Now, what do I draw from these simple lessons of travel and history? I draw the conclusion that this wonderful development by irrigation is not what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], who sits near me, has said in reference to this enterprise. It is in one sense a new thing. It is a new thing to us here. The burden rests on us who favor the irrigation to establish some reason for the amendment. In that sense we agree. But irrigation is not a new thing in the world's history. Egypt four thousand years ago had irrigation. Egypt is, and has been for ages, 3,000 miles of a broad ribbon of cultivated verdure, through the system of irrigation.

Mr. HERBERT. If the gentleman from New York will permit me to interrupt him, I think he is a little mistaken in what I said. I did not say it was a new thing. I said it was a new scheme that we are called upon to enter. Irrigation is as old as the world.

Mr. COX. I think I have the point logically right. The gentleman is correct in fixing the onus on our side. We must establish affirmatively the necessity for this investigation, so as to ascertain its practicability. It is new to that extent. But the system of irrigation has been tested for thousands of years in other places throughout the older portions of the world. It has been found a blessing to mankind.

When, sir, I read the report of Major Powell, which shows how much arable land we have extant, and how much we may reclaim by timely and careful legislation, I am prepared to recur to the language involved in the resolution and to agree that we should make some tentative measure looking toward irrigation. Members from New York and New England, from the South and from all parts of the country, should have an opportunity to reclaim this grand area. It can be reclaimed. The evidence shines through history that it is not merely possible but probable. It will give to our country something that will take away the menace from our extraordinary immigration.

But I can not dwell upon these matters. I only intended to refer to the historical matters with reference to our own interests. I may not, Mr. Speaker, have in view the very large sums that it adds to our valuation, but if Major Powell, who writes this report, is at all conversant with his business it will add, as he says, to the valuation of our country to-day by irrigation an amount as large as the national debt, or over two billions of money.

Mr. SYMES. The gentleman will pardon me there. My statement was in connection with the public domain of the United States alone, that the Government by establishing these sites for reservoirs and preventing them from being taken under the pre-emption laws, and the vested rights accruing will add to the value of its own public domain land which can be disposed of hereafter for a thousand million dollars if it desires to do so; and it can dispose of it hereafter when it is reserved by the amendment that I have offered at the rate of from $2 to $5 an acre, as it disposes of the lands of military reservations and the like. When you dwell upon the accretion of value to the United States and its citizens by the reclamation of these lands outside of the immediate value to the Government, you reach realms that figures can not calculate.

Mr. COX. Gentlemen may smile at such a calculation. I will read from Major Powell's report to confirm it. Then you can judge of the advantage that will be gained. I will say to the gentleman from Texas, behind me, who seems incredulous, that I got much of my inspiration on the subject from Governor Throckmorton. But let me read what Major Powell says:

As estimated above, the area of the arid region is about 1,300,000 square miles. Of this, about one-fifth is too rugged or too elevated to admit of cultivation under any condition of agriculture likely to arise for a century to come. A smaller fraction consists of playas, or drainless desert plains, so flat that it is impossible to wash the salts from their soils. There remain about 1,000,000 square miles of land which need only water to be rendered productive.

At the minimum price of public land, $1.25 per acre, a price greater than its value for pasturage, this land has a valuation of $800,000,000; at $30 per acre, a moderate estimate of its value when irrigated, it would be worth $19,200,000,000. For the irrigation of this area we have the annual precipitation upon 1,300,000 square miles of mountain, valley, and plain. This ranges from 5 inches or less on the dryest plains to 30 inches on the mountains, and even 75 or 100 inches on the highest peaks, and the average for the whole region is not far from 15 inches. If all this could be applied to the land suited by configuration for cultivation, it would afford about 20 inches of water annually for the whole area, or nearly double the amount which need be applied to crops during the growing season. The water which falls in the arid region would therefore fully meet the agricultural needs if only it could be stored until the proper season and then conveyed to the proper land. Unfortunately, many causes conspire to render impossible the full realization of so desirable a result.

Of the precipitation, which has the form of snow, a large fraction is returned to the air by evaporation without going through the process of melting. Of that which falls as rain, a large part is received by the soil and evaporated from it without gathering in streams, and the only portion of such unconcentrated rainfall serviceable for agriculture is that which falls on the farming land during the growing season. Of the water from rain and melted snow which gathers in channels and forms streams, only a portion has such relation to arable land that it can be utilized; the remainder flows too low, or at such distance from the land as to be beyond the economic limits of conveyance. Moreover, a comparatively small portion of the stream water is furnished during the farming season, and that which must be stored in reservoirs in order to utilize it necessarily suffers material loss by evaporation.

Under such adverse conditions it is manifest that only a small portion of the rainfall of the region can be made to serve the farmer, and that there is no solid foundation for the opinion sometimes expressed that the greater part of our arid West will ultimately be reclaimed. In 1880 less than 1 per cent. of its arable portion had been supplied with irrigation water, and it is not believed that with the most elaborate irrigation works this can be increased to more than 20 per cent. On the other hand, an estimate based on such data as are available leads to the anticipation that when all the larger streams have been brought under control, and the storage of water has been carried as far as it may be economically, there will be redeemed about 15 per cent. of the region, or 150,000 square miles, the whole comprehending an area which exceeds one-half of the land now cultivated in the United States. At $30 per acre, this will add $2,880,000,000 to the wealth of the nation.

I know these statements may seem to be exaggerated. We may not find this wonderful increase by reason of water. But, sir, water is a wonderful agent in the production of earthly fruits, as well as in their transportation.

Whatever may be done with this amendment, however chimerical it may seem to some, or practical to others, is it not worth a trial? Should it not receive some initiation from the practical good sense of the American Congress? May it not be a remedy in one sense for many of the ills which seem so large and menacing to us now, when these millions of acres in New Mexico and Arizona and other places west of the one hundredth meridian of longitude shall have been redeemed from their natural impoverishment, and when our desert shall be made glad and our waste places be made to blossom as the rose.

For the Lord shall comfort Zion; He will comfort all her waste places, and He will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord; joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving, and the voice of melody.

When St. Ferdinand captured Seville from the Moors he bore the conquest to heaven. The Virgin desired that her champion should ask a boon. The King asked for a fine climate and sweet sun; it was conceded. For brave men and fair women; it was conceded. For oil, wine, and the fruits of the teeming earth; it was granted. Then he asked for water, to add its blessing to the teeming grain fields and olive orchards; this, too, was conceded. "Then," said the King, "will it please the beauteous Queen of heaven to grant unto Spain a good government along with its symbolic pure water?" "Nay! nay! nay!" said the Queen, "for then the angels would desert heaven for Spain!"

Mr. McCULLOGH. Does the gentleman mean to say that the women of Spain and the water of Spain are both fair?

Mr. COX. The gentleman will please be seated until I let him up. [Laughter.]

I do not mean to say, Mr. Speaker, that our advancing people are angelic; nor that they would desert the Mississippi, or the Ohio, or the Hudson valleys, or the fair plains west or east of the Mississippi; or that they would leave the unctuous soil of the prairies for this inhospitable region, even though its aridity should be remedied by irrigation. I do not mean that our own progressive people, seeking ever the Westward ho! and the Star of Empire, will flock to the lands thus rescued by our providence; but I do mean to say that as economists in a large sense, looking to our splendid future and contemplating the immense possibilities of our beloved country, we might at least try the experiment and ascertain what the sun and the sky and the soil and, as the greatest desideratum, the water, will do for America. [Applause.]

Mr. SYMES. I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, time has been yielded to me, but I will reserve my remarks until this subject comes up again.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 8662) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the Shoshone and Bannock Indians for the surrender and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the Fort Hall reservation, in the Territory of Idaho, for the purpose of a town site, and for the grant of a right of way through the said reservation to the Utah and Southern Railway Company, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 219) granting a pension to James Smallidge;

An act (H. R. 9830) for the relief of Lachlan McIntosh;

An act (H. R. 9263) granting an increase of pension to Abraham J. Brickles; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 219) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution entitled a "Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government."

The message also announced that the bill (H. R. 5539) for the relief of John J. Coughlin had been presented to the President on August 17, and, not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, had become a law without his signature.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE KENTUCKY RIVER.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] to withhold his motion to adjourn for a moment. I desire to call up a bill which has been favorably reported from the Committee on Commerce to authorize the construction of bridges across the Kentucky River. The railroad is finished nearly to the river and the company are very anxious to build the bridge without delay. The bill is in the usual form.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11262) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Kentucky River and its tributaries by the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine and Beattyville Railroad Company.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine and Beattyville Railroad Company, a corporation organized under act of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges, and approaches thereto, over the Kentucky River, in the State of Kentucky, and also a bridge or bridges over the tributaries or forks of said river, at such point or points as said company may deem suitable for the passage of its said road over said river, or its tributaries or forks. Said bridge or bridges shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, and, at the option of the company by which it or they may be built, may be used for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot-passengers.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act, and subject to its limitations, shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States, and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph companies; and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal-telegraph purposes.

SEC. 3. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object, the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawing of the bridge, and a map of the location thereof; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War, the bridge shall not be built; and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge or bridges shall have, and be entitled to, equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon the payment of reasonable compensation therefor; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge or bridges and the railroad company or companies desiring to use the same shall fail to agree upon the terms with reference to the use of same, all matters of issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties.

SEC. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge or bridges herein authorized be not commenced within two years and completed within five years from the date thereof.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, as I have stated, this bridge bill is in the usual form. It was reported from the Committee on Commerce by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] who was the acting chairman. It makes no appropriation of money, but simply authorizes the company to build bridges across the Kentucky River. The bridges are in my State and in my district and the bill is all right. [Laughter.]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCREARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISAAC N. ENLOE.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8636) for the relief of Isaac N. Enloe, and that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to audit and pay, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, Isaac N. Enloe, late a captain in Company C, Twenty-sixth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers, the amount due for his services and allowances as captain, from the 1st day of October, 1864, to the 11th day of April, 1865, at the rate allowed by law to officers of that grade in said service, less first sergeant's pay, from the 1st day of October, 1864, to the 11th day of April, 1865.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I think we ought to hear the report read. I do not object to the consideration of the bill, but if I caught the reading of it correctly, it is a bill to pay an officer who had a certain rank for performing the duties of another rank.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois. It is for the payment of an officer for six months and ten days who during that period performed the duties of captain, and whose commission should have been such as to operate from the time he commenced to perform the duties.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Was he commissioned as captain?

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois. He was ultimately. However, let the report be read if the gentleman desires.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I am satisfied with the gentleman's statement.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAND. Regular order.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I ask unanimous consent to present and have printed in the RECORD an amendment which I give notice that I intend to offer at the proper time to the bill for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma.

There was no objection.

The amendment is as follows:

That the Territorial government established by this act shall not extend to or exercise any jurisdiction over any part of said Territory of Oklahoma except as to what is known as the Public Land Strip until the President shall issue his proclamation as provided in section 6 of this act.

Mr. FELTON. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] to the pending bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. SYMES. That is the regular order. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. FELTON] for that purpose. The amendment which he desires to offer is an amendment to the pending bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] has moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. SYMES. I appeal to the gentleman from Alabama to yield a moment to let the gentleman from California offer this amendment.

Mr. FORNEY. I yield to the gentleman.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 9, page 1, after the word "——," insert "and for the selection of water-sheds that shall be preserved."

Line 5, after the word "purposes," insert "and such selected water-sheds."

Mr. DORSEY. I desire to correct the RECORD.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion of Mr. BLAND was agreed to—ayes 36, noes 17; and the House accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

SENATE.

MONDAY, September 3, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, returning, in compliance with a resolution of August 30, 1888, a resolution of the Senate of August 20, 1888, calling for a report of the amount due postmasters under the act of March 3, 1883; which, on motion of Mr. COCKRELL was, with the accompanying resolution, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of August 9, 1888, a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, together with other papers, covering the decision in the case known as the Guilford Miller case, and affecting the title to lands claimed by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, alleged as being within the indemnity lands of the grant to the company; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PETITION.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Martha Webb, Mary E. Waters, C. M. P. Richardson, and 12 others, citizens of Salem, Mass., praying that a pension be granted to Miss Anna Ella Carroll for services rendered the Union Army during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 2804) for the relief of Wilbur F. Melbourne;

A bill (S. 2256) to amend the military record of J. M. Peyton;

A bill (H. R. 2273) for the relief of William L. Travis;

A bill (S. 2545) granting to Stephen H. Lossee an honorable discharge from military service, dating as from June 28, 1864; and

A bill (S. 2492) to correct the military record of Fountain C. Pollock.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 704) granting a pension to Thomas Redmond, late private Company K, Fourth United States Infantry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

DISTRICT ELECTRIC WIRES.

Mr. FARWELL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 105) to restrain the erection or maintenance of overhead electric motive power and electric light wires in the cities of Washington and Georgetown, reported it with amendments.

Mr. FARWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], to report it with a recommendation that it do not pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution of Mr. EDMUNDS, as follows:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to revoke any permit granted for the erection of overhead electric wires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This resolution is reported in obedience to the instructions of the Senate given when the communication of the commissioners of the District of Columbia was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It is reported back with the recommendation that it do not pass, and it will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. That is the resolution in regard to the electric wires?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There were two resolutions, one resolution referring the communication with instructions to report a resolution requesting the commissioners to revoke their permits. That is reported adversely. The joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is reported favorably with amendments.

Mr. HOAR. There was a petition referred to that committee with an order of instruction. Is there any report on that also?

Mr. FARWELL. There is a report.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that there ought to be action taken upon the resolution, because the company in pursuance of law, as I am advised by persons interested, are now ready and going on, and in my judgment they ought to go on, because as a matter of course the law is in force, their rights are fixed by law, and they should proceed to execute the duty enjoined upon them by the law. But if there is any doubt about it, if any one wishes further to contest their right to go on, the resolution ought to be acted on promptly. Otherwise they will be clearly justified to-day and from this time on to proceed in the execution of the work.

I make the statement now, because no complaints should be made if they should go on in obedience to the law, with the highest respect for the opinion hastily expressed by the Senate the other day, unless the Senate desires to call the resolution up and re-enforce it by overruling its committee.

I do not like to move to indefinitely postpone the resolution in the absence of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. I will submit the motion to indefinitely postpone the resolution, but I shall not ask that it be acted upon now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I make the motion in the Senate that the report of the committee be approved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proper motion would be to proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not like to do that in the absence of the Senator from Vermont. I will let it stand over in deference to the absence of the Senator from Vermont, except that I wish to submit the motion.

Mr. VEST. I was about to observe that I participated in the debate when the resolution of the Senator from Vermont was adopted. I stated then that I did not know any of the gentlemen engaged in the enterprise of putting up these overhead electric wires. Afterwards a gentleman here with whom I have a very slight acquaintance called at my house and stated to me that I was entirely wrong with regard to the statement that there was anything dangerous in the wires, and that the amount of electric power to be used could be demonstrated to be entirely harmless either to men or to animals. I told him that had not been the experience of the country in regard to these electric wires, and that his statement astonished me very much. Without ever having had any personal interest in the matter, I have been informed that the amount of power necessary to be used as a motive power would always destroy or very seriously injure animal life when brought in contact with it. He said he was prepared to bring the evidence before the Senate, but that the Senate refused to hear him or his associates in this enterprise, and had cut the whole thing off at the knees unjustly and in utter disregard of their rights. I assured him there was no such intention on my part or on that of any other Senator within my knowledge, and suggested to him that he could bring the whole matter before the Senate and reopen it by getting some Senator who is upon the other side of the question from myself and who believes that these overhead wires ought to be put up simply to offer a resolution rescinding the resolution already adopted by the Senate, and that that would reopen the whole question and it could be heard.

Afterwards I received papers, which I have not brought to the Senate to-day, from an electric company, located in Philadelphia, if I am not mistaken, in which they state emphatically that wires can be put under-ground as economically as they can be placed overhead, and that without any sort of danger to anybody. I, of course, know nothing about these facts, but I suggest to the Senator from Ohio and to the Senate that with this diversity of opinion, with this antagonism of proof, and in the absence of the Senator from Vermont, the mover of the resolution, the matter ought not to be taken up to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said so, and I do not desire to take up the resolution; I simply wish to enter the motion to indefinitely postpone it, if that is in order.

Mr. HOAR. I think it ought to be stated what perhaps the Senator from Missouri, who has been, I think, absent for a portion of the past two weeks, may not be aware of. A petition was presented to the Senate setting forth very fully the facts in regard to this matter. That has been heard on evidence before the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I understand their report is unanimous in regard to the matter of the danger. That petition, as was stated to the Senate the other day, is signed by persons of high standing and character in Massachusetts and states that their workmen and the manufacturers of this material handle it with entire ease, and that it never did more than raise a slight blister or something of that kind; that they are entirely careless about it.

Mr. HARRIS. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts and to the Senate that the committee has had the petition to which he refers under consideration, and on Friday the committee heard the testimony of some electrical experts. There was quite a mass of testimony laid before the committee in the form of affidavits and certificates of electrical experts. That testimony, if not now printed, will be printed in a day or two and will be laid before the Senate. The testimony taken before the committee shows conclusively to my satisfaction that there is no danger to human life or to animal life in the amount of electrical power necessary to propel the cars on any street railroad. But the testimony will be laid before the Senate in the course of a few days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report goes over under the rule.

CALVIN J. COWLES AND GEORGE B. HANNA.

Mr. PASCO. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill (S. 2970) for the relief of Calvin J. Cowles and George B. Hanna was postponed last week be reconsidered, and that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been indefinitely postponed, that order will be reconsidered, by unanimous consent, if there be no objection, and the bill, with the adverse report, will be placed on the Calendar.

CAMPAIGN WORK BY A SENATE EMPLOYÉ.

Mr. VEST submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service be instructed to inquire whether employés of the Senate, whilst receiving pay, and when the Senate has been in session, have been engaged in preparing partisan campaign literature for the purpose of advancing the interests of the Republican party in the pending canvass, and whether publication of the matter so prepared has been published by an employé of the Senate with his official character printed thereon, and what legislation is necessary to prevent and punish such conduct, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, before the resolution is disposed of, I wish to make a few remarks in regard to it.

I happen to appreciate rather fully a criticism such as is contained in offering this resolution, and I have offered it very deliberately. Some two years ago, or possibly more, an employé of the Government in the State of Missouri, a United States district attorney, was removed by the President of the United States because he had during a canvass gone out into the State and made speeches in behalf of the Democratic party. The attention of the President was called to the matter, and he immediately and very promptly, and I thought rather summarily, removed this gentleman and suspended his functions as a district attorney.

I came to the city of Washington and remonstrated against that removal, but was informed by the President that he proposed to mete equal justice to both parties; that he had removed an attorney in the State of Pennsylvania, a Republican, for doing the same thing; and he proposed to make no distinction between members of his own party and members of the opposing organization.

The President further stated that it had been represented to him, and he exhibited newspaper articles and private letters to that effect, that Mr. Benton, whilst the United States circuit court and district court were in session in Kansas City, where I live, had left his official duties and gone out for the purpose of making political speeches in behalf of the Democratic ticket. It was within my personal knowledge that that statement was not true, and I immediately produced (anticipating that this charge had been made) a letter from the United States district judge, who was not a Democrat, stating that Mr. Benton had attended promptly to all the duties of his office, and had cleared his docket at that term of the court, giving his personal attention to cases for trial and to motions pending.

The result was that Mr. Benton was reinstated; and I was maligned, not to use the term blackguarded, in the Republican press from one end of this country to another, and especially in my own State, for having interfered and caused the reinstatement of this gentleman; and it was stated then that the time of Mr. Benton belonged exclusively to the Government of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator right there, in order to preserve the consecutiveness of his narrative, state whether the President reinstated the district attorney in Pennsylvania who belonged to the other party and who had been removed at the same time with Mr. Benton?

Mr. VEST. I do not know. I never examined particularly into the facts of that case. I was attending to the interests of my own constituency, and I am not prepared to say whether he was restored or not. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I want to enlighten the Senator by saying that the President did not reinstate him; and therefore the high sense of propriety with which he started out, according to the statement of the Senator, seems to have been abandoned very early in the campaign.

Mr. VEST. My recollection is (although I do not undertake to say that it is entirely accurate) that the gentleman in the State of Pennsylvania went into a regular canvass, maligning the Administration and Mr. Cleveland, and I say here now, openly and publicly and emphatically, that it was indecent in an officer of this Government, holding a position under it and under a Democratic administration, to go out upon the stump and malign the party at whose hands he then held official position.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to call attention to a fact which the Senator from Kansas seems to overlook in the statement made by the Senator from Missouri, that Mr. Benton was restored because the charges made against him were shown by him to be absolutely false, and the charges against the gentleman in Pennsylvania, I understand, were never shown to be false.

Mr. VEST. I have before me, received this morning, this book [exhibiting], which will be seen not to be a very small one, upon which in large letters is printed "Protection Echoes from the Capitol," with a very picturesque and graphic description of the Capitol itself and the surrounding grounds, umbrageous foliage, fountains, and spectators in large numbers, "Edited by Thomas H. McKee, Assistant Librarian of the United States Senate."

This gentleman, and I have the very slightest personal acquaintance with him, is receiving an annual salary of $1,440, as the rolls of the Senate show. He has the unquestioned right to publish his lucubrations, personal, political, philosophical, or otherwise, at his own expense, and to distribute them or publish them for sale anywhere within this country. That is the unquestioned right of every American citizen. But Mr. Thomas H. McKee has no right whilst he is drawing $1,440 as an employé of the Senate to issue this book, unfair, unjust, malignantly partisan in its character, garbled extracts from speeches of members of both Houses of Congress, taken without their context, used manifestly for a partisan and unfair purpose, and to place upon the cover of that book, as a letter of credit to the people of the United States, his official character as an officer of the Senate.

It may be said that he is still attending to his duties; that he is still giving his time to a reasonable extent to the discharge of his duty as an officer of the Senate; but that is not the question. I was confronted the other day by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] not now in his seat with the statement that Mr. Trainer, who is the secretary of the Library Commission, is now doing campaign work in the city of New York. I know nothing of the fact, but I take it that it may be said that Mr. Trainer is also doing his duty as secretary of the Library Commission and has omitted none of the functions of that office.

What I object to specifically, and I put it to every fair-minded man, is that no employé of the Senate, whether Democrat or Republican, has the right to issue in his official character a book such as I hold in my hand.

I have not, of course, been able in the few hours that the work has been in my possession to go through these profuse and abundant pages. The Mills tariff bill came to the Senate on the 21st of July last, and in the short time since that bill has been here this gentleman has found time to make up this enormous book, for it is a large one, filled with partisan extracts, and not only with partisan extracts, but with attacks upon members of Congress who differ with him in political sentiment.

Take the case for instance, in the very first part of it, under the heading of "Agriculture," on the second page:

No. 3. Agriculture is the oldest—

Said Mr. HATCH, my colleague in the other House, and chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, and in this gentleman's category an unfortunate Democrat. This purports to be an extract from the speech of Hon. WILLIAM H. HATCH, made May 14, 1888:

AGRICULTURE.

No. 3. Agriculture is the oldest—

Now interpolates this employé of the Senate—

[How about hunting and fishing, savage life?—Editor.]—

and the most honorable occupation of man. It is the foundation of our earliest civilization, and its development marks the periods of the passage in the history of the world "from savagery to barbarism and from barbarism to civilization." It is to-day the foundation of all commercial and material progress in this country. It marks in every age of the world the steps of civilization as clearly and distinctly as the posts mark the miles on the road. The history of the world teaches us that in all ages, in every country, agriculture has borne more than its fair proportion of the burdens of government.

Whether taxation has been exacted from it in kind, or under whatever system taxes have been levied, agriculture has always borne more than its just proportion, and too often, as in our own country, has been the prey of skillfully devised systems of taxation for the benefit and enrichment of some favored class. This, Mr. Chairman, is particularly true in the nineteenth century and under our republican form of government in the year 1888.

Now adds Mr. McKee:

[Will the Mills bill change it?—Editor.]

Again, upon page 23 of the same book, he quotes from the same gentleman, who seems to be a favorite of Mr. McKee, as follows:

Between 1850 and 1860 the farmers of the country more than doubled their wealth, etc.

* * * * * * *

If this is not true, why is it that during the same decades, and fostered and protected by this system, the manufacturing districts have so enormously increased in wealth? There is but one answer. Protection benefits the manufacturer alone, while it oppresses and levies tribute upon all other classes.

Now, adds Mr. McKee in this book purporting to be one of extracts:

[Why not multiply manufacturing districts?—Editor.]

And so on, until I could weary the Senate with excerpts like those I have read.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator if he will at some time state to the Senate what is the distinction in principle or propriety, in his judgment, between such an argument, extracts made by a person in the employ of the Senate, and the similar campaign efforts made by Senators themselves?

Mr. VEST. A Senator of the United States expresses his opinions, and he is sent here by his constituents to honestly do so. Mr. McKee is not hired by the Senate of the United States to prepare campaign literature. I should insult the intelligence of every man here or elsewhere if I went further in this distinction. Is it possible that the Senator from Massachusetts can justify a thing of this sort? It would turn every employé of the Senate into a partisan for one of the respective parties now struggling for supremacy in this Government. It has never been done in the history of the Government. This is the first instance I have ever known in which a work of this sort, malignant and partisan in every line of it, with garbled extracts, unfair, unjust to the Democratic party, has been sent forth with an official indorsement upon it, for it is nothing else—a letter of credit with the official character of the person who collated it or who prepared it.

I have no doubt that I am doing a very great personal favor to Mr. McKee in advertising his book, and it will give it probably a larger circulation throughout the country. He is welcome to the benefit of such an advertisement as he now receives; but I do most emphatically protest against this practice. I call attention to it because the Democratic party has been taunted and reviled upon this floor for having trampled upon the principles of civil-service reform, and in the classic language of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] being a sham, a fraud, and a pretense.

That brings me, Mr. President, to a few remarks I desire to submit, as it is a cognate subject, in regard to what was stated in the Senate on last Friday. It was said then by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], when I called attention to the fact that a pension examiner had been sent from the State of Missouri to Illinois to perform campaign service in the year 1884, that he was entitled to thirty days' leave of absence with pay, and the Senator from Illinois claimed that in his judgment he had only obtained the statutory right of this gentleman when he got twenty-three days' service. According to the record he was granted twenty-three days' leave of absence with pay from October 6 and nine days without pay from October 29, 1884. This record shows that the gentleman was appointed in July, 1884. In October, less than three months afterwards, he received those twenty-three days' leave of absence, and in a few days afterwards nine days' leave. At that very time a regulation of the Interior Department was in force, made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] when Secretary of the Interior, and that regulation is in the following language:

Regulation 14. Employés who have been in the service of the Department less than one year—

And this gentleman had only been in the Department three months—

may be granted leave at the rate of two and one-half days for each month of service, and no more.

That was the order of January 1, 1884; and he was entitled under that regulation to seven and a half days' leave of absence and no more at the time he received twenty-three days' leave of absence with pay in October, 1884.

I have received since that debate from the postmaster at Chicago a letter which, in justice to him, I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CHICAGO POST-OFFICE, OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER,
Chicago, Ill., September 1, 1888.

DEAR SENATOR: I see by the telegraphic dispatches from Washington, published in this morning's papers, that Senator CULLOM, of this State, in some remarks made in the Senate, for political effect, and in seeking to create the impression that Democrats are now as bad as the Republicans were when in power in forcing contributions from Government officials for political purposes, charged in substance that I, as postmaster of Chicago, by collusion with my law partner, have been engaged in making collections of post-office employés here for Democratic campaign purposes.

Permit me to assure you, Senator, that this charge is wholly untrue. Senator CULLOM has evidently been misled by the statement of some vicious and reckless newspaper scribbler. I have had no connection whatever with the solicitation of subscriptions or with inviting contributions from post-office or other Government employés, either for political or other purposes.

On the contrary I have been very careful, when spoken to by post-office employés in regard to the matter of campaign contributions, to inform them that they were under no obligations to make any such contributions: that if they contributed at all it must be voluntarily done on their part, and that whether they did so or not would make no difference whatsoever in respect to their treatment by or their relations to the postmaster, adding that they were free to act in regard to such matter just the same as if they were not office-holders. More than this, when inquired of, as I have repeatedly been, as to whether or not post-office officials here would contribute for campaign purposes, I have uniformly replied that that was a matter of their own free choice; that I could and would have nothing whatever to do with making collections or inducing any subscriptions from such employés, and that I could not permit post-office officials to be approached for any such purpose while on duty or at the post-office building.

The only circumstance that affords any basis whatever for these allegations concerning myself, in connection with political subscriptions or collections, is this, that some time ago Mr. E. M. Phelps, of this city, the present Illinois member of the national Democratic committee, called on me and inquired what course I pursued in 1884, when I was the Illinois member of that committee, in the way of procuring subscriptions toward the national committee campaign fund. I explained that several individuals assisted me in making solicitations, naming some of them, to whom I gave written authority for the purpose. He asked whom he could get to assist him. I replied that I did not know any better than he. Just then Mr. E. B. Esher, with whom I have a limited arrangement as to law business (but who in reality has not been practicing for about three years, until within the last few weeks), came into the room in which Mr. Phelps and myself were in conversation. He retired within a few moments, when his name was barely mentioned in connection with the inquiries made by Mr. Phelps. Afterward it transpired that Mr. Phelps induced him to solicit subscriptions for the national Democratic committee, and still later it seems that he issued a few invitations to post-office employés to call at his office, and I have learned that he procured a few subscriptions from such employés, but only a few. This was done wholly without my knowledge or consent. I have not been at the law office occupied by Mr. Esher for nearly three years (during all of which time I have attended strictly to post-office business), and I have no control whatever over Mr. Esher's movements, nor am I in any way responsible for his conduct. He is a free man, and acted on his own responsibility and that of Mr. Phelps.

However, after some criticism was made in a Republican newspaper in regard to solicitations being made by Mr. Esher, he voluntarily proposed to drop the whole matter, and being requested so to do by Mr. William Ritchie (with whom he also had some business arrangement) and by myself, he complied, and has since, as he informs me, refused to make solicitations, or even to receive subscriptions.

It may be added in this connection that Mr. Esher informs me that he advised each and every post-office employé whom he approached in asking subscriptions that the postmaster knew and would know nothing of the matter, and that it would make no difference whatever as to their standing as officials whether they contributed or not.

I have explained thus in detail in order that you may understand the entire situation, so as to be able to refute the charges if it be needful so to do.

I am, with much respect, sincerely, yours, etc.,

S. CORNING JUDD, Postmaster

P. S.—I write to you in this matter because, according to the telegraphic dispatches, you made some very appropriate remarks in the Senate on yesterday concerning Senator CULLOM'S statement.

S. C. J.

Hon. GEORGE G. VEST,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

Mr. VEST. It is proper for me to state that I have no acquaintance with Mr. Judd, and I have had no communication with him except that letter. After reading in the RECORD the statement of the reporter of the Chicago Tribune as to the manner in which he obtained what purports to be his information, after his admission that he deliberately lied to this man Esher, that he misrepresented his own character, that he afterwards went in his proper character and then lied to him again by stating and making the impression that he would not publish what had occurred in the morning, but says that he had already put it in type, and therefore he could very safely say that he would not publish it in the future, I was willing that the public should pass upon the credibility of that witness.

I have simply to say in conclusion that if the postmaster at Chicago has violated the civil-service law, let the committee raised at the instance of the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], of which he is chairman, investigate that post-office, and if that man has been guilty of prostituting his official position for the purpose of blackmailing his employés, no Senator in this body will more cheerfully indorse his removal and his public disgrace.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, so far as the reference of the Senator from Missouri to me again is concerned I have nothing more to say about it. He seems to have a kind of nightmare on that subject, and I am willing to let him rest there.

As to the charges against Mr. McKee, I wish to say that I have known him for some time, and I recognize him as a gentleman of character, a gentleman who strictly attends to his duties as charged upon him by the Senate; and if there is any Senator here who can point to a single instance where that gentleman has failed to discharge his duty in waiting upon the Senate and furnishing documents and what not, then I should like to have him do so.

I undertake to say that it is none of the business of the Senate whether that gentleman saw proper to put in his odd hours, either during the day or at night, in preparing a book, even though that book may be in favor of protecting American labor and American industry. So far as I am concerned, I think he has done a good piece of work, and I think it will give some trouble to our Democratic friends to answer the extracts that are taken from speeches made by honorable Senators and by Representatives in the other branch. That is all I have to say about Mr. McKee.

Now, the Senator from Missouri comes back to the Chicago post-office, and he is tremendously exercised because, forsooth, the reporter of the Chicago Tribune happened to get a card and took advantage of it, and went in there and found out what was going on in the office of the gentleman who happens to hold the post-office in Chicago, and uncovered the scheme that was carried on for the purpose of forcing out of the employés of the post-office there money to be handed over to the national committee to secure the re-election of the present President of the United States.

The Senator is also tremendously exercised because of that long interview which was read from the Chicago Tribune, and he charged that he would as lief think of having Tom Paine preach to a Christian congregation as to have a Republican interview introduced here in the Senate of the United States.

I wish to give the Senator some Democratic literature. I suppose he will not charge that the Chicago Times is a Republican or even a Mugwump paper. I have understood it to be time out of mind not only a Democratic paper, but one of the very bitterest kind, like the postmaster at Chicago. I have had the privilege of knowing that distinguished gentleman a good many years. I know him personally. I knew him when he lived down in the country as a country lawyer, and I knew him when he was one of the most venomous Copperheads that there was in the State of Illinois. Now, sir, I want an article from the Times read, and also one from the Chicago Globe, which is also a Democratic paper and indorsed as such by another Democratic paper in another State.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Chicago Times, Friday, August 24, 1888.]

MR. JUDD'S BLUNDER.

The Times has been just and merciful to Mr. Postmaster Judd. When he has been wantonly assailed it has defended him. When his removal has been urged by interested parties it has pointed out the undesirability of such a course. But the Times has no words of apology or defense for the postmaster's indirect method of aiding the campaign fund of his party by violation of the spirit of the civil-service law. In this matter the devil has been beaten around the stump. The postmaster has tolerated the application of moral duress to employés of the office in order to compel their contribution to campaign funds. Under these circumstances contributions are not voluntary. It is no excuse to plead that the practice was established under another administration.

Mr. Judd's zeal for his party outruns his sense of justice and fairness when he points out that the sand-bagging is so nicely calculated as not to offend against the letter of the law. The excuse is unworthy an official of Mr. Judd's high character.

TAKE IN HIS SIGN.

In the daily law report the fact is recorded that a suit was commenced by Judd, Ritchie & Esher. Mr. Esher is the young man who, having occupied a place in the Chicago post-office abolished as a sinecure, has been engaged in interviewing employés of the post-office regarding their contribution to the Democratic campaign fund. Mr. Esher is provided with a list of all employés and the salaries paid them, and is conducting the "important" business of fleecing them for party purposes. Mr. Judd explains this outrage with the remark that he has merely a nominal relation with Esher, who, having no relation to the public service, is not amenable under the law prohibiting assessments upon civil servants for political purposes. If Mr. Judd has no connection with Mr. Esher let him take in his law sign.

If the employés of the post-office wish to devote some portion of their slender salaries to campaign purposes they will have no difficulty in ascertaining the fact for themselves and in finding the headquarters where such favors are received. The Esher persuasion office had better be shut up instanter.

[Indorsement of the Globe as a Democratic paper.]

JUST SO.

The Michigan Democrat says that he has "no hesitation in commending the Chicago Globe fully and unsparingly, because," he says:

"This is the only genuine unalloyed Democratic paper in Chicago, and is the paper Democrats like to get hold of. It is scholarly and fair, and is delivered in Sturgis for 12 cents per week."

It is delivered in all other places at the same price, which is less than one-half its value. Because its Democracy is the very best quality that is found on any market. There is nothing "snide" in it. And this is the reason why it is "the paper that Democrats like to get hold of."

[The Chicago Globe, August 23, 1888.]

A STUPID BLUNDER.

The civil-service-reform act of 1883 was not meant to be a sham. It was directed against the vicious practice of using the public service and servants as instrumentalities of partisan purposes. This was the central idea in which it originated. Upon this basis it was advocated and enacted. It positively forbade any assessments upon the stipends of public servants, and made it a punishable misdemeanor for any person being in the public service to solicit or receive even a perfectly voluntary contribution from another public servant. If it did not in terms forbid any public servant to make a voluntary contribution to party funds, it was because some squeamish legislators believed, or pretended to believe, that such a prohibition would encroach upon the limits of personal liberty. But a voluntary contribution is one that is initiated by the volition of the contributor, and not by the suggestion of a party agent that it is "a matter of importance" that a voluntary contribution be made. Any contribution made upon such a suggestion the spirit and reason of the law forbid; otherwise there is no restraint upon an easy evasion of it, which would stamp the act as a legislative cheat and fraud.

It is unfortunate, therefore, that so indiscreet a person as Mr. Edward B. Esher should have been authorized by any representative of the national Democratic committee to receive subscriptions to a "campaign fund." It is unfortunate because Mr. Esher stands (nominally, at all events) in a professional relation to Postmaster Judd, and because he was, until three or four months back, one of Mr. Judd's subordinates in the post-office of this city; and, more than all else, because he has shown a lack of judgment in sending messages to employés in the public service requesting them to "call and see" him "on a matter of importance," the matter being a solicitation of a contribution from each of them to the party "campaign fund."

Conceding to him all the strength of his defensive plea that he is "assessing nobody," that every person in the civil service who may receive his peculiar invitation to call and see him is at "perfect liberty to give or not, as he may feel disposed," and that he is making "this collection" (the words are given as his own) in a way different to that which was pursued by the Blaine party collectors four years ago, it still remains true that the proceeding is repugnant to the spirit and reason of the law, because it includes an attempt to make such collections from persons in the civil service, under a form of words which, though not a menace, is a suggestion to the mind of such persons of a risk that may be incurred by acting as they would have acted if they had not received Mr. Esher's invitation to call and see him "on a matter of importance."

The whole matter is reducible to a single point. The proceeding of Mr. Esher is a solicitation by a party agent of "voluntary contributions" to a party fund from attachés of the civil service. Such a proceeding is offensive to the spirit and reason of the reform act. It is an offense, therefore, against the moral standard of the Democratic party. It is reprehensible, therefore, and should be discontinued by peremptory order at once. Its continuance certainly will do more harm than all the money that post-office clerks and letter-carriers may contribute can repair. In the name of morality, liberty, and justice, the only solid bases of Democracy, let this blunder be stopped.

Mr. CULLOM. Before the Senator talks any more about the Chicago post-office he had better consult with his Democratic friends in that city. That is all the advice I have to give him on that subject.

Apropos to the articles which have been read in reference to the conduct of the public business in Chicago, I think a paragraph from the letter of acceptance of the Presidential nomination four years ago, written by the present President, ought to be put in the RECORD also as good doctrine, and also an extract from a speech by Judge Thurman, the Democratic candidate for Vice-President. I ask that they be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Mr. Cleveland's letter of acceptance in 1884.]

When we consider the patronage of this great office, the allurements of power, the temptation to retain public place once gained, and, more than all, the availability a party finds in an incumbent whom a horde of office-holders, with a zeal born of benefits received and fostered by the hope of favors yet to come, stand ready to aid with money and trained political service, we recognize in the eligibility of the President for re-election a most serious danger to that calm, deliberate, and intelligent action which must characterize government by the people.

My friends, you will never have any genuine reform in the civil service until you adopt the one-term principle in reference to the Presidency. So long as the incumbent can hope for a second term he will use the immense patronage of the Government to procure his renomination and secure his re-election.

Mr. PLUMB. I only want to make a remark or two about this matter. The district attorney in Missouri, Mr. Benton, is fortunate in having a very powerful advocate in the person of my friend the Senator from that State. The Pennsylvania district attorney, Mr. Stone, did not have any such advocate, and the very natural result ensued that the President set out, like an old farmer going to mill with a peck of meal in one end of the bag and a stone in the other, and announced with a great flourish—whether he did it with or without a wink the Senator did not say—that he intended to make this a square thing between the two parties, and having removed a Republican he was going to remove a Democrat. He ended it up by yielding to the blandishments of my friend from Missouri, by restoring Mr. Benton to office, but he did not perform that service for Mr. Stone. It is suggested by the Senator from Arkansas that Mr. Benton had made out a good case by showing that the charges against him were false. No one who knows the political faith of my friend from Missouri and the great eloquence with which he expresses Democratic sentiments can doubt that he made a case where Mr. Stone could not possibly make one.

But, Mr. President, nobody cares anything about these matters in themselves. The Senator from Missouri did not object to Mr. McKee doing what he has done. He would not object to one of the employés of the Senate of the Democratic persuasion, of whom there are a number, doing the same thing, as a matter of principle. The wrong with him is the fact that the Republicans are able to show the difference between Democratic professions and Democratic practice, and that is all there is of it.

I do not care about the present Democratic candidate for President having given $10,000 to the Democratic campaign fund, coupled with the assurance of the person who is nearest to him that he has always done that thing ever since he has been a Democratic office-holder. I do not object to that. I do not object to it even if it is coupled with the insinuation from authoritative sources that that example should be followed by all the officials all over the country. But I do object to the sniveling and canting hypocrisy which accompanies this whole performance. That is what I object to, and that is the only Republican objection to it. It is because this Administration pretends to be holier than any other administration has been; it is because it says it is not doing these very things which it is doing. That is what we challenge and that is the whole thing.

The Senator from Missouri said the other day that he thanked the Lord he was not a Mugwump. He knows what that means. He knows the term is used to designate a class of people who believe in a non-partisan service, or claim so to believe; and therefore he means that he is not a civil-service reformer, and he means that he believes that "to the victors belong the spoils;" and so when he comes in here and arraigns Mr. McKee for this book and gives it this advertisement, which but for him it would not have, he simply objects that the Republicans are doing that which he knows the Democrats are doing, and the point of his objection is that he knows the Democratic Administration can be convicted of entire insincerity. That is the milk in the cocoa-nut. Nobody is deceived by all this outcry. The country knows it and thoroughly understands that this Administration while professing one thing has done another, and if it is condemned it will not be because it has turned out Republicans and put in Democrats, as the Republican party expected it would do; but it is because, while it has pretended that it did not do it, it has been cleaning the service of every Republican on whom it could put its hands.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas certainly does me injustice when he says that I would not condemn a similar action on the part of a Democratic employé on this side as that of which Mr. McKee has been guilty. I do not object to Mr. McKee putting in his odd hours in furnishing literature to the party of which he is no doubt an honest member; I do not object to his sitting up at nights and giving his time to the political service of that organization; but I do object to his sending out to the people of the United States that partisan and unfair and false document with his official character stamped upon it, and if any Democratic employé of the Senate should do it I would vote to put him out of office, and I would demand it as a Democratic Senator.

I am a Democrat; I am proud of it; I could not be anything else and never expect to be anything else; but I am not a Mugwump, and I do not believe that "to the victors belong the spoils" in the acceptation given to that phrase generally in the partisan press of the country. I believe that, other things being equal, a Democrat should be put in office under a Democratic administration and a Republican under a Republican administration; and I would as soon put the soldiers of another army on my picket-line as to expect Republicans to guard well the interests of the Democratic party when in office.

The Senator says that this Administration has professed one thing and done another. Mr. President, I wash no dirty linen in public. I am loyal to my party and its convictions, and I ask no quarter and give none. I ask no favors. If the Republicans can beat us in this contest fairly, no man will accept the result in a more manly spirit than myself; but I, for one, shall leave nothing undone that a gentleman can do to defeat them, and when the administration passes into other hands, if it does, I shall not be found whining and asking favors and soliciting alms from a Republican administration. I will do, as I have always done, accept the fate of war honestly and fairly, and with such equanimity as my temperament will admit. But I deny that this Administration has acted upon the principle that "to the victors belong the spoils."

Sir, to-day the Departments in this city outside the classified service are filled with Republicans. To-day in the Treasury Department outside of the classified service, $248,000 is paid to Republicans and $206,000 to Democrats. All over this country to-day Republicans are in office outside of the classified civil service and inside of that service. There are not in the Departments here, out of two thousand employés in some of them, two dozen Democrats. When I go to-day into a bureau of some of these Departments to see the head of it, who is a Democrat, I am compelled to whisper to him for fear the Republican clerks shall hear what I say in regard to my party and in regard to its interests; yet that Senator tells us that this Administration has acted upon the principle that "to the victors belong the spoils!"

Mr. PLUMB. Allow me to ask the Senator a question which will enable him to draw a still finer distinction than he has drawn. What business has he to be talking about the Democratic party and Democratic interests to the head of a bureau in office hours? It seems that that discounts Mr. McKee very considerably.

Mr. VEST. When I go to the head of a bureau in regard to an appointment in that bureau, I do not choose to take into my confidence the clerical force of that entire bureau when I know perfectly well that they belong to the opposite party. The civil-service law, which I am sorry to say I voted for after voting for amendments which would have put it upon a just and equitable basis, putting in one-half Democrats and one-half Republicans, retained in office the entire corps of old moss-backed radical officials who have been assessed year after year to furnish the campaign fund of the Republican party; and they are in office to-day, holding office to-day, and if Cleveland is defeated a shout of exultation will go up from the office-holders in this city such as has never been heard before except from the throats of a great army in the hour of a victory. They are receiving their salaries under a Democratic administration and praying day and night for its defeat; and yet we are told that the doctrine that "to the victors belong the spoils" has obtained under this Administration against its pretensions. Why, Mr. President, when I think of the condition of the public service of this country to-day, so far as patronage is concerned under a Democratic administration, I am inclined always to refer to that historic expression of Lord Clive when arraigned before the House of Lords in England on the charge that he had, when governor-general of India, taken from the native princes largesses to a considerable amount after he had overthrown with the English troops their territories, when he broke forth spontaneously with the honest exclamation "By God, gentlemen, I wonder at my own moderation!"

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator certainly does not apply that remark to himself.

Mr. VEST. I apply it to the fact that we have permitted Republicans to remain in office all over this country from one end of it to the other, and the return we get is taunts and abuse such as we have had to-day from the Senator from Kansas. We are told, "Oh, yes, all this is a fraud and a sham and a pretense," when the bureaus are filled with Republicans; when in the Treasury Department alone forty thousand odd dollars more are drawn in the way of salaries by Republicans outside of the classified service than by Democrats four years after the Administration has gone into power. When Mr. Cleveland has subjected himself to the criticism of his own party and to the assaults of the opposite party, and has attempted honestly and fairly to carry out what he believes to be the spirit and essence of the law and regulations of the civil service, he is repaid by such attacks as we have heard in this Chamber to-day.

Since the Senator from Illinois has been reading newspaper extracts, which he says come from Democratic papers, I must confess that the condition of newspapers in the city of Chicago is such that I have never been able to tell a Republican newspaper there from a Democratic paper. I am in that sort of nebulous condition that if I were called upon to pick out a Democratic paper in Chicago I could not do it, even if I were upon oath. But the Senator read from the Chicago Times. I go to the official authority on newspapers, which is the American Newspaper Directory for 1887, and I find that the Times is put down there: "The Times; every morning and weekly, Wednesday; Independent."

Mr. PLUMB. But it is supporting Mr. Cleveland.

Mr. VEST. Yes, Mr. President, and so is George William Curtis supporting him, but I take it he would consider it a personal insult to be called a Democrat. The logic of my friend from Kansas is defective when applied to results. The New York Times is supporting Mr. Cleveland. For me to go into the arcana of these newspaper offices and find out the personal and political motives which control their action would be to expect me to perform a feat far above the average of any mortal man. All I know is that the statement made by the Senator from Kansas that this Administration has acted upon the principle that "to the victors belong the spoils" is contradicted in every State and in every Congressional district of this broad land; and that is all I propose to say upon that.

Mr. PLUMB. Only a word. The Senator from Missouri very carefully avoided any expression as to what had been going on outside of the city of Washington, but it has been the constant claim of the Democratic party to show how merciful they have been, though I never heard any one before praise that party for restraining themselves like Lord Clive, that they did not turn upside down the Departments in Washington. During the twenty-odd years of Republican administration those Departments had come to be filled by persons who were to a very large extent no more Republicans, or I might say no more Democrats than if no such parties existed. In addition to that, plenty of Senators on the other side of the Chamber and plenty of members of that party serving in the House of Representatives found ways to get men of their own political faith into place under Republican administrations. I will venture to say that the number of persons in the Departments who are actively Republicans to-day and will vote the Republican ticket this year is less than the number of those people who would have voted the Democratic ticket under Mr. Arthur.

But, notwithstanding, the President of the United States knew perfectly well that he could not unchain the Democratic tiger for the first four years with entire safety; he had to some extent observed the public sentiment and was too sensible not to know that he could not break up the entire service during those four years and expect to be re-elected. In order to carry that on he had to keep in a very large proportion of Republicans. I say that without any special reflection upon the character of Democratic employés, although if one or two Senators were present who are now absent I could mention some examples of persons whom they recommended to office who were obliged to be excluded from the public service because they could not write or speak the English language correctly or anything near it. Therefore a certain retention was necessary in the process of weeding out, but the process of weeding out has gone on until the Senator can now go to the head of every bureau without bringing himself into offensive contact with Republicans. But I would like to know what it is that has to be told privately to the head of a bureau in one of the Departments at Washington. I would like to know the ground of complaint that the Senator makes that he could not speak privately on party matters to the head of a bureau. I did not know before that these bureaus were here for the purpose of transacting private business. I supposed that they were here for the purpose of transacting public business. All that they have a right to transact goes upon the files, which are public property and open, under proper circumstances, to public inspection; and if the Senator goes there to speak privately about these things, he is doing that which, in my judgment, he has no business to do, and something which I think I can say that under former administrations was not done and was not necessary to be done.

So the complaint after all is that the Senator is afraid to expose these private matters to the ears of public employés. But that is not the question. The question after all and what is now his objection is that men in the public service are performing duties, are transacting matters that are pertinent to the opposite party. I thought at first when I saw the document the Senator exhibited this morning that Mr. McKee had been guilty of impropriety in identifying himself with it as assistant librarian of the Senate, but that was disposed of in a measure when I considered that the Librarian of Congress publishes an almanac.

Mr. VEST. Not a partisan one.

Mr. PLUMB. That does not make any difference. He publishes an almanac on the title-page of which he identifies himself as the Librarian of Congress for the purpose of giving circulation and currency and authenticity to the publication. That evidently was the purpose of Mr. McKee. He wanted to show that the publication was compiled under such auspices as could be relied upon as showing it to be correct.

But suppose the Speaker of the House of Representatives should, as he might properly do, publish a work on the tariff, a manual we will say, would he be likely to put his name on the title-page as JOHN GRIFFIN CARLISLE, or would he add to it "Speaker of the House of Representatives?" I am advised that he has just published an article in a magazine on that very subject, over his own name. The currency it gets grows out of his official position.

Mr. VEST. I think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] made that suggestion to the Senator from Kansas. Does the Senator from Kansas mean to say that Mr. CARLISLE ever published in a magazine an article and signed himself "JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker of the House of Representatives?"

Mr. DAWES. There is no name, I think.

Mr. VEST. That is a very different thing.

Mr. PLUMB. But the currency it gets grows out of the fact that he is Speaker of the House of Representatives. It did not add anything in his case because he was a well-known man, but he might properly have put that on the title-page of the book, and Mr. ROGER Q. MILLS might advertise himself while he is doing partisan service running around the country and being introduced to his audiences no doubt as being chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and his speeches get currency as such.

But, Mr. President, this Administration soon tired of its virtue. It is thoroughly understood, and it is susceptible of proof, that clerks have been detailed in the Pension Office to write vindications for publication of the President's vetoes. The head of that bureau himself, according to a charge which has been made and I believe truly, certainly not denied, has spent more than one-half of the last year away from his duties perambulating around the country. The Commissioner of the General Land Office has had prepared and put in circulation a document bearing his official signature, containing, as I think, the grossest possible falsehood. Of that I do not complain, however. Over his official signature there has been printed at Government expense a circular as a Democratic campaign document, a statement in regard to the lands recovered to the public domain by this Administration. It is signed "S. M. Stockslager, Commissioner of the General Land Office." If it were not that I may have occasion to do it some days later, I should read now that circular for the purpose of showing that at the Government expense a document of that kind is being circulated.

It is just as well to have a fair understanding about these matters. Within a certain limitation these things have always been done, but it is not for a Democratic administration, that treats the public service not like a public trust but like a private snap, to complain at this late hour with no greater foundation than that which the Senator from Missouri has been able to find.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PLUMB. Let it go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over until to-morrow and be printed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting schedules of claims allowed by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department since the allowance of those embraced in House Executive Document No. 31, of the present session, on account of compensation of postmasters readjusted under the act of March 3, 1883.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made. Does the Senator desire that the document be printed? The exhibits are voluminous.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is just a list of names. It is a document which is generally printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—CANADIAN HAY CLAIMS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the attention of the Senate for a moment. I received some six or eight weeks ago a letter which I send to the desk and desire the Secretary to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ST. JOHN'S, PROVINCE OF QUEBEC, CANADA, August 2, 1888.

HON. SIR: The inclosed document, which I take the liberty of mailing you, speaks for itself. In these times of agitation on matters concerning the United States and England and English colonies, would it not be a propitious one to bring these hay claims forward? A settlement has been attempted several times, but to no avail. Hon. Mr. Fairchild knows all the points of the case, and he can furnish you all required information. It is a just reclamation, and if you can get it paid I can assure you that the support I could get from Canadians in the United States in favor of your party in the coming election would be felt. You can also name your conditions. The amount involved is about $1,000,000, and claimants whom I control are willing to make a good allowance for the trouble and work necessary.

Yours, truly,

CHAS. ARPIN.

Hon. Senator HOAR, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I suppose every person in the Senate receives occasionally letters of that sort from men who are ignorant as they are base, and probably treats them with silent contempt. I should have done the same. I dislike very much to do anything that seems like an exhibition of virtue on such a subject; but it has occurred to me that the character of the claim made it probable that the man who wrote this letter might be imposing upon the confidence of a considerable number of poor persons; and therefore, on consultation with two or three experienced members of the Senate, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] among the rest, I thought it was best to make inquiry into the character of the writer; and I have learned that he is a person widely known in Canada, where he lived, formerly a candidate for the Canadian Parliament, very nearly elected, a man of considerable intelligence and good address. It has seemed to me, therefore, proper that the communication should be put on the files of the Senate, so that if these claims are ever pressed they should be attended with the history of this corrupt effort on the part of the man who has them in charge.

I move that the letter be put upon the files of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to hear that letter read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read again if the Senator desires.

The Chief Clerk read the letter.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Before that——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will pardon the Chair one moment. Under the rules of the Senate the Chair thinks this communication, being signed by a subject of a foreign power and not transmitted by the President of the United States, can not be placed on the files of the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I merely wish to state, before that paper is placed upon the files of the Senate, that I read this morning in a number of newspapers that this trans-Atlantic policy, as it was called, was one that England did not propose to indorse, and among other suggestions was one that behind Canada were English gunboats. I want to reply to that from the United States Senate that we have men behind our guns and no slaves and no subjects.

Mr. HOAR. This is not presented as a petition to the Senate; it is a private letter to me; and it seems to me that by unanimous consent the Senate may order it to be put on file. I think the original document ought to be where it can be referred to and not kept in my custody when the claims are presented in two or three years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule on the subject will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following clause from the fourth paragraph of Rule VII:

But no petition or memorial or other paper signed by citizens or subjects of a foreign power shall be received, unless the same be transmitted to the Senate by the President.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that that be waived.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the rule may be suspended and that this paper may be placed on the files of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection.

PRINTING OF FISHERIES TREATY DEBATE.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Before these bills are adopted I should like to ask what committee they are reported from?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It strikes me we ought to have some statement from some member of that committee as to why we are throwing away this amount of money. We have done nothing in the last twenty minutes but pass bills distributing money without any reason whatever being assigned.

Mr. PALMER. To relieve the mind of the Senator from Virginia I will state that all of these appropriations have been recommended by the Light-House Board and the Treasury Department, and they have been carefully considered by the Committee on Commerce and reported on favorably. The amendments to these House bills have been made so as to include the appropriations in the bills.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like the Senator to state if any of these bills emanated from the House of Representatives.

Mr. PALMER. All of them. I think if the Senator will take the Calendar he will see that they are all House bills.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The only change that appears to be made by the Senate committee is that the words "so much of the money as is necessary shall be appropriated" are inserted.

Mr. PALMER. The limitation is changed to a positive appropriation.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, in each of those cases——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to hear the titles of those bills read. I do not know them by their numbers. Let the titles be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8855) for the establishment of a light-ship with a steam fog-signal at Sandy Hook, New York Harbor.

A bill (H. R. 1228) for establishing light or lights and a fog-signal at or near Ballast Point, entrance to San Diego Bay, California.

A bill (H. R. 1239) to extend the jurisdiction of the Light-House Board to the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers, California.

A bill (H. R. 8750) for the establishment of a light-house at or near Tangier Island, Chesapeake Bay.

A bill (H. R. 5716) for establishing a light at the mouth of Otter Creek, Lake Champlain.

A bill (H. R. 1641) for the erection of a light-house at or near a point about midway between Barnegat and Navesink lights, in the State of New Jersey.

A bill (H. R. 1249) for establishing a light-house and fog-signal on Roe Island, Suisun Bay, California.

A bill (H. R. 1912) for the establishment of a light-house at the mouth of Great Wicomico River, Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These bills of the House of Representatives having been passed with amendments, an order will be entered in each case for a committee of conference with the House of Representatives on the bills and amendments.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. PALMER, Mr. DOLPH, and Mr. VEST were appointed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have all those bills passed from the control of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have not.

Mr. MITCHELL. If they have not, I should like to offer an amendment to one of the bills providing for light-houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has not indicated the bill which he desires to amend.

Mr. MITCHELL. Any one of them providing for a light-house; I do not care which.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The last Order of Business is 1983, House bill 1912.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to amend that bill, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote by which the bill was passed will be reconsidered, if there be no objection, and also the vote ordering the bill to a third reading. The Senator offers an amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the body of Senate bill 3280 as an amendment, to provide for the construction of a light-house at Heceta Head, Siuslaw River, Oregon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed as an amendment to add the following:

That the sum of $80,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of a site and the construction of a first-order coast light-house at Heceta Head, Siuslaw River, Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I also offer as a further amendment to that bill——

Mr. COCKRELL. I want some explanation about that amendment before it is agreed to. I shall have to object to the consideration of the bill if everything every Senator wants is to be tacked on to it.

Mr. MITCHELL. The amendment is a precise copy of a bill that has been favorably reported from the Committee on Commerce and is on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Where is it on the Calendar?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is Order of Business 2040. It was recommended as an indispensable light by the Light-House Board and was reported by the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Final action has not yet been taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon, which is an amendment to the amendment, the Chair understands.

Mr. PALMER. I see no objection to that. It is customary to amend House bills by appending Senate bills, and this is one of those cases, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as amended and as proposed to Order of Business 1983, House bill 1912, is agreed to in the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. I further move to amend the same bill by attaching to it as an amendment the body of Senate bill 3237, Order of Business 2038.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as an amendment the following:

That the sum of $60,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the establishment of a light-ship, to be provided with fog-signal apparatus, outside of the bar of the Columbia River on the Pacific coast.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that this is also strongly recommended by the Light-House Board, and a bill of similar purport has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Commerce and is now on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Where is that on the Calendar?

Mr. MITCHELL. Order of Business 2038.

Mr. PALMER. I will suggest that the report on that bill be read.

Mr. BECK. Let the recommendations of the Light-House Board be read. What is the date of it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no report.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Light-House Board recommends it.

Mr. BECK. When?

Mr. MITCHELL. At this session of Congress.

Mr. BECK. There have been a great many recommendations this session purporting to be from the Light-House Board, but I think generally by their secretary. It seems to be a very easy thing to obtain from him a recommendation of anything. I doubt whether the Light-House Board knows much about it. The date of the letter will indicate. If it is in the regular estimates of the Light-House Board I should have a great deal more faith in it than if it came in subsequently.

Mr. PALMER. I will state in regard to that, that the recommendation is under the signature of the Secretary of the Treasury and we have the right to infer that it passed under the inspection of the proper officers, whether done by secretaries, clerks, or whoever. I suppose the mere manual labor was done by the clerks.

Mr. BECK. The moment we get the date of the recommendation that will show for itself. Then I shall desire to make a remark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the unfinished business is in order; but first the Chair will present House bills for reference.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

On motion of Mr. BLAIR, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. 371) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools be reprinted.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Senator from Nevada to give way.

Mr. STEWART. I can not give way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] to the substitute reported by the Committee on Territories, which has been read.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] does not appear to be in his seat and I have sent for him. I wish, however, to say—and I might as well say it while he is absent—that I can not vote for the amendment of the Committee on Territories, and I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Illinois; and in deciding so to vote I do not settle in my own mind the question whether the Pan-Handle of Idaho, as it is called, should finally be annexed to what constitutes the Territory of Washington or not. At a previous session of Congress I reported in favor of a bill for the admission of Washington Territory, which included in the proposed State this northern portion of Idaho Territory. I did so then, being a member of the Committee on Territories having charge of that measure, believing from the evidence before the committee that it was the desire of the people of Northern Idaho to be attached to Washington Territory when that Territory should become a State, and that there was such a natural barrier between the northern and southern portions of Idaho as made it practically impossible for those two sections of that Territory ever to have very definite relations with each other. When this matter was first agitated that seemed to be the almost universal sentiment of the people in Northern Idaho. A few residents of Cœur d'Alene County were disposed to go to Montana; but I think it is fair to say that when the question was first agitated the inhabitants of Northern Idaho felt that there was never to be any such connection between Northern and Southern Idaho as would give them the opportunity of participating in the State government if Idaho should be admitted finally as one State; and so they wanted to be annexed to Washington Territory, except some who, as I have said, preferred perhaps to go to Montana Territory.

The bill for the admission of Washington Territory which was passed by the Senate at the last session of Congress provided for the incorporation in the new State of what is called the Pan-Handle of Idaho, Northern Idaho; but as it was manifest that bill was not going to pass the other branch of Congress and become a law, a bill was passed originating in the other House, and being first passed there, annexing this northern portion of Idaho to Washington Territory. The Senate concurred in the passage of that bill, but it reached the President so late that he did not sign it and it did not become a law. Whether he purposely neglected to sign it or whether he did not have time to consider it I am not informed. Since then there has been a very vigorous objection to the proposed division of Idaho Territory and the incorporation of the northern portion of it with the Territory of Washington from the people of Idaho. I think that the objection has been a growing one from the time when the project was first broached, but I am not satisfied that it ought not to be done; and that depends largely in my mind upon the question whether it is practicable to establish reasonable communication between the southern and northern portions of Idaho.

It is still claimed by the people in Northern Idaho that that is simply impossible, that the range of Salmon River Mountains is so impassable that no railroad is to be constructed through there, and that if such roads are projected the expense of their construction will be so great that they will never be completed. On the other hand it is said that railroads have been projected, with easy grades comparatively, all within the Territory of Idaho, and that it is probable that at no distant day they will be built.

As I say, this question of whether Northern Idaho ought to be incorporated with Washington Territory depends, in my mind, largely upon whether it is going to be possible and practicable within the near future to establish communication between the two sections of the Territory within the Territory. If it is so that the people of Northern Idaho have got to go away out into Washington Territory and around through Oregon to get to the capital of their Territory, then I think their contention is just that their relations, commercial, social, and natural, with Washington Territory are so great that they ought to go to Washington Territory; but on the other hand if they can be accommodated with railroads there would seem to be a harshness about what is called the dismemberment of Idaho.

And so I have said that I am going to vote against the committee's amendment, but in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, without having determined in my own mind the question of what should eventually be done in this matter. I do not think it necessary to decide that now, and I think that to pass the bill as the committee propose would be very likely to complicate the question and to delay perhaps for an indefinite period the admission of Washington Territory.

I think that Washington Territory ought to be admitted as a State at once; it ought to have been admitted two years ago at the last Congress. It seems to me, not to use a harsh phrase, little less than an outrage that a Territory so far advanced as Washington Territory, with such needs, should not be admitted to the Union; and the principal reason, or one of the principal reasons, which determines me in voting against the committee's amendment is that, with the feeling against this dismemberment of Idaho Territory represented by the governor and by the Delegate from Idaho Territory, I fear to incorporate it in this bill will complicate and delay and make impossible the admission of Washington Territory at this session of Congress.

If Washington Territory shall be admitted as a State with its present boundaries this question can just as well and perhaps better be settled after that is done than to attempt to settle it now, for the people of Northern Idaho certainly will be no less inclined to go to Washington when it has become a State than they are now when it is only a Territory and has only the hope of becoming a State. Indeed I think they will be more anxious to have this matter done after Washington Territory shall have been admitted as a State, because then they would have the certainty that if such an act could be passed they would at once be admitted to the privileges of statehood.

Another reason why I think it is well to have it delayed is that this question, of which I have spoken, as to whether communication is to be established between the two great sections of Idaho Territory will perhaps approach nearer to a solution than at the present time; and so much of this case depends, in my mind, upon the solution of that problem that I think it is quite well to wait before determining this matter until we have further light upon that subject.

As has already been stated to the Senate, one county in Northern Idaho is practically unanimous for being attached to Washington, and I think that upon a vote being taken as proposed by the committee's amendment it is probable that a majority of the people of Northern Idaho would vote to be attached to Washington Territory and to be incorporated within the boundaries of the new State. There would be considerable opposition, a large opposition to it. It is a question which excites quite a division of feeling in Northern Idaho, and believing that this matter will settle itself in the near future if we admit Washington without including the Pan-Handle of Idaho within the boundaries of the new State, I shall vote against the committee's amendment and for the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

I will say this, however, if I have not already said it, that I am not yet convinced that this is the right and proper thing to do, but the question is so open to doubt and can be so easily settled in the near future that I think it better not to attach Northern Idaho to Washington now.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I did not expect to occupy any of the time of the Senate upon this subject further than I have already, and I would not rise now to say a word but for the fact that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], who intended to take part in this discussion and present some facts and arguments against the segregation of these counties and the annexation of them to Washington Territory, has been called away and left in my hands some papers which he desired that I should present. The paper which he specially desired that I should lay before the Senate is an argument prepared by the Delegate from Idaho Territory against annexation and in favor of keeping the four counties proposed to be taken off from Idaho in that Territory as they are now. Before doing that, however, Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a meeting of the Democratic Territorial convention which has been recently held (on the 22d of August), in which I find the following resolution offered:

At the meeting of the Democratic Territorial convention the following resolution was introduced by P. M. Davis, of Nez Perces County:

Resolved, That this convention, recognizing the justice of the demand of the people of North Idaho for annexation to Washington Territory, hereby indorses the Stewart amendment to the bill now before the Senate for the admission of Washington Territory with North Idaho attached, and submitting the annexation matter to the voters of North Idaho.

That was a resolution offered by Mr. Davis, who represented Nez Perces County, and I will say here that that county is the county in which is found the original capital of Idaho Territory, it having been taken away from that county, which has been in favor of annexation to Washington Territory ever since. The resolution was submitted to the convention.

T. D. Cahalan moved to lay the resolution on the table.
Motion carried that the resolution be voted upon by counties.
The result was, 44 to lay on the table to 6 against. The counties voting against were, Latah 3 and Nez Perces 3.

Latah is a county, as I understand, that was originally carved out of the county of Nez Perces.

Mr. PLATT. That was done at this session of Congress.

Mr. CULLOM. As the Senator from Connecticut says that was done at the present session. This shows that so far as the Democratic party of Idaho is concerned the delegates from every county in the Territory voted against the annexation of those four counties to Washington Territory, except those of Nez Perces and the county which has just been carved off Nez Perces, they casting three votes each. All the rest of the delegates attending that convention—and I suppose it was the usual number—expressed themselves against the annexation of any portion of Idaho Territory to the Territory of Washington.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] asks how many of the districts proposed to be transferred voted in favor of the transfer. I have just stated that Nez Percé County is one of the counties proposed to be annexed, and that Latah County, which was a part of Nez Percé County, also voted in favor of annexation—those two counties and none others—all the others voting in favor of keeping the Territory intact as it is now.

I do not care to occupy the attention of the Senate in discussing this matter over again, further than to say that I agree in a measure with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] that if it should be ascertained hereafter that there is no such thing as getting direct communication between the northern and central and southern counties of Idaho, I should be in all probability in favor of the annexation of the northern counties to Washington; but it so happens that just now we have had evidences which I presented before showing that it is possible that direct railroad communication between the north and central and southern portion of that Territory can be made; and it is not only possible but it is probable. Surveys have already been made, and it has been reported to be an entirely feasible enterprise to build such a road. So I have no doubt myself that it will be but a very few years, possibly not more than one or two years, before railroad communication will be had between these counties proposed to be annexed to Washington Territory and belonging to Idaho and all the other portions of the Territory of Idaho; and whenever that is done there is no reason, so far as the convenience of the settlers is concerned in their commercial and political relations, why they should not remain as they are, a portion of Idaho Territory.

I have been anxious that the honorable Senator who has reported this measure proposing to make this annexation should allow the original bill to pass the Senate, admitting Washington Territory pure and simple and permitting this other question to come up in the future if it is desired that it should do so after we have further information on the subject, so that we may be able to determine whether or not as a matter of actual fact they ought to belong to Washington Territory on account of mountain ranges and the difficulties of communication between the north and south portions of Idaho. I do not believe that any such difficulty will exist except for a very brief time; and so far as communication is concerned, they can now go around, as it has been intimated by the Senator from Connecticut, and get to the capital of Idaho just about as easily as they can go west and get to the capital of Washington Territory. I submit in perfect good faith, after an expression of the people of that Territory both on the part of the Democratic party and the Republican party, which include all the people substantially I take it, against the annexation of this part of the Territory almost unanimously, whether it is fair to those people, whether there is that sort of necessity for action on the part of the Senate that would justify us in proceeding to carve off a portion of Idaho Territory and annex it to another without submitting the question to the people of the Territory, but simply with a provision in the bill that allows four counties that propose to be annexed to vote on the subject with no reference to the will or wish of the other portions of the Territory.

I do not desire to take up further time except to ask the consent of the Senate that the paper which I hold in my hand, and which is a paper prepared by the Delegate from Idaho Territory, and which was sent to me by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] before leaving the city, with the request that I should submit it, be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The paper will be read.

Mr. GEORGE. Before that is read I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois a question which I wish to have settled as having some influence upon my vote. At one time when this matter of annexation of what is called the Pan-Handle of Idaho Territory to Washington Territory was being considered I was a member of the Committee on Territories, and some question of this sort was raised, that owing to the peculiar physical conformation of Idaho Territory it was likely that it would be a very long time before it would have a sufficient population to become a State, and that the cutting off of this Pan-Handle would tend to delay that time indefinitely. I would like to hear the Senator upon that question. What effect would the cutting off of this Pan-Handle from Idaho and annexing it to Washington have upon the prospect of Idaho Territory ever becoming a State, a member of the Union as one of the States itself?

Mr. CULLOM. I can answer that question, I think, very readily. The Territory now as a whole has a population of about 100,000. The counties proposed to be annexed to Washington Territory have a population of about 20,000; so that it would take off 20,000 of the population as the Territory is at present organized, and of course would put the Territory back by that much in its chances for very early admission into the Union. I discussed that question somewhat when I occupied the attention of the Senate before. I took the ground then, as I do now, that when it is shown very clearly that a Territory has a capacity to make a State of wealth and business and population, all the elements that would make a respectable State of strength, and after it has struggled along through many years since 1861, I believe, without railroads, without any of the elements of civilization that belong to our older sections of the country, but its population pioneering through that region and developing it and undergoing the privations and hardships that they have done, as they are just reaching the point where they can begin to feel that they are early going to be entitled to admission into the Union, or at least the right to ask for admission, at that point of time to cut off one-fifth of their population and four of their counties territorially would be a hardship and wrong that the Congress of the United States ought not to insist upon unless the whole people by vote should say that they desire or were willing that that should be dons.

Mr. GEORGE. The whole people of what?

Mr. CULLOM. The whole people of the Territory of Idaho, not simply of the four counties, but the whole people of the Territory should have the power to say whether that should be done or not. Of course Congress has the power constitutionally and legally to cut the Territory all to pieces, and scatter it about and annex it to different Territories, or all to one, or to a State; but there ought to be an element of fairness in our legislation. In considering this question, especially in view of the fact, as I said awhile ago, that recent surveys by parties connected with the Northern Pacific or the Union Pacific Railroad—I have forgotten which—have shown that a route can be found, and is found, that will enable a railroad to be built from the north side of that range of mountains down the Snake River into the central portion of the Territory so as to thereby connect the two portions and give them opportunities of communication one with another, we ought not, just at this point of time, with all these facts before us, to segregate the Territory and annex part of it to any other without the consent by a vote of the people of the Territory. That, I believe, is an answer to the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. No; there is one point on which I did not make myself fully understood. I have heard that the soil or the climate of Idaho Territory was not favorable to a thickly inhabited State. That is a point to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator—whether that be so or not. If that be so, the cutting off of this Pan-Handle would tend very much to keep that Territory back from arriving at the point in its population where it would be entitled to admission into the Union.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as the question of resources or capacity for development is concerned, I think the Senator from California [Mr. HEARST] stated here when the discussion was up before that he had been over that Territory and it was a magnificent country and was capable of great development and possessed great resources; but I think the paper I have sent to the desk, prepared by the Delegate from that Territory, will perhaps give all the facts that the Senator from Mississippi desires in reference to the subject. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 17, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Appreciating the interest you have taken in Idaho Territory, I wish to submit, through you, some of the reasons why the people of Idaho are utterly opposed to the bill of Senator DOLPH, as amended by Senator STEWART, which is now before you—Senate bill No. 12—providing for the segregation of Northern Idaho and giving it to Washington, and the proposed transfer of the residue of our Territory to the State of Nevada; and I desire to enter a solemn and earnest protest against such proposed legislation for the following reasons:

First. That Washington Territory is large enough and is suitable for a State without the proposed addition from Idaho, as it has 69,180 square miles, with facilities for commerce, agriculture, coal-mining, and lumbering interests unexcelled by any other given area on the continent. It has 2,715 more square miles than all the New England States combined.

Second. Idaho has 84,800 square miles, but has a much greater area of desert and mountain surface than Washington Territory, and the latter is far superior in commercial and agricultural wealth; hence there seems to be a palpable aggrandizement of Washington by the proposed diminution of Idaho.

Third. The proposed segregation practically takes off the four northern counties, Kootenai, Shoshone, Nez Perces, and Idaho, comprising an aggregate area of nearly 25,000 miles. If we resort to comparison, we find that this section is a little larger than the State of West Virginia. Thus it will be seen that the territorial area in question, called the diminutive Pan-Handle, is not so insignificant after all. It may be remarked of this extensive region sought to be "annexed" to the proposed State of Washington that its climate is peculiar, differing from the general climate of the remainder of Idaho in the fact that seasonable rains so moisten the soil that it requires no irrigation; cereals and all vegetable products are raised in abundance without the artificial aid of water.

The balance of the Territory, or Southern Idaho, so called, will consist of nearly 60,000 square miles, all of which require irrigation to produce well, so that it will be seen the only real and actual division of Idaho is climatic and not geographical.

It is therefore quite essential to the preservation of the Territory that this section should remain within and continue a portion of Idaho.

Fourth. Let us now consider the matter of the alleged barriers between Northern and Southern Idaho. They never did exist as insuperable geographical obstacles to the easy intercourse of the two sections, and now they are practically removed by roads and contiguous settlements.

This bugbear, of which so much use was made in the early stages of this secession movement, disappears before the advancement of our pioneers, and no honest and intelligent observer acquainted with the facts would risk his reputation in urging it as a cause for separation.

Two railroad surveys have been made through these mountains, neither of which finds any serious obstacles to railroad construction.

The alternation of mountains and valleys between Northern and Southern Idaho is not uncommon to the mountainous regions of the whole Territory; and while the intervening valleys do not partake of the nature of plains, being long and narrow, there is one valley alone, the valley of the northern Payette and Great Lakes, in the southern portion of Idaho County, as large as the State of Delaware, and is fast being settled by industrious people.

Fifth. The whole of Idaho has great facilities for irrigation, its eastern boundary being marked by the summits of the Rocky Mountains, and the different ranges that form its spurs, where fall snows inexhaustible and perpetual. The never failing supply of water from this source makes numerous and abundant streams that flow through every portion of the Territory.

Idaho has, together with Montana, the Virginias, North Carolina, and Tennessee, the only purely mountain boundary known to the Territories or to the States of the Union. Washington and Oregon are divided by the Cascade Mountains into Eastern and Western Washington and Oregon. A large portion of California lies east of the Sierra Nevada range. Vermont, Pennsylvania, New York, Nevada, and Colorado, Arizona, and New Mexico, not to mention other States and Territories, contain vast ranges of mountain structures within themselves and are not bounded by them. In fact, about the only natural boundaries hitherto respected by Congress have been the great rivers, Ohio, Mississippi, Missouri, and Columbia, and the Great Lakes and the foreign jurisdictions of the British Crown on the north, and the Republic of Mexico on the south.

It is obvious on the face of these facts that the trifling elevations between Northern and Southern Idaho constitute no solid ground for the proposed segregation. The reasons and their cause for this separation do not exist in the topography of the country. We must, therefore, conclude that the advocates of this measure, though perhaps sincere, are mistaken in their policy.

Sixth. We have entered the great race of embryo States; and while we do not claim to have suffered more than the others in early privations, common to each, we do claim to be the peers of all who have hitherto laid the foundations of the great States adorning our history, from the admission of Vermont in 1791 to that of Colorado in 1876.

Seventh. I would now plainly suggest our quality and claim of statehood. We have lived under our own system of laws; our jurisprudence is respected by surrounding States; our institutions of learning and our social and moral foundations are laid in industry, integrity, and honor; our rights of property have become fixed and vested under our laws; our population has increased from the unit of a thousand at our organization to one hundred thousand at the present time; and our people are looking forward, with the highest hope and with unexampled unanimity, to a not distant admission into the Union. While seeking this exalted condition in the family of States, nothing can be more abhorrent to our people, and even to the country at large, than those vast measures—of imperial legislation, it may be called—proposed by the several bills now before Congress by which our fair Territory is to be parceled out and surrendered to a neighboring State and Territory, who are anxiously waiting to appropriate our varied resources, and even the body of our people, to themselves.

Upon what grounds or policy, worthy of the name of statesmanship, is it necessary to blot from the map of our national domain a region of our country known and distinguished at home and abroad as one of the richest and most prosperous of the Territories, and now fitted by area, population, and resources, to become a State of the American Union?

The only reason I can see for this innovation upon all precedent is to gratify the territorial avarice of surrounding States; for it is an admitted fact that no such precedent can be found in our history, nor in that of any modern State or country, except perhaps the unholy obliteration of Poland from the map of Europe.

The people of the United States, from the beginning until now, have hailed with rapture and proud satisfaction the acquisition of new States under and by virtue of the Constitution, and, if we mistake not, they will swell their opposition to defeat this scheme of the public plunder of our soil and the transfer of our people to foreign jurisdictions, unacquainted with their wants and unacknowledged by their laws.

The purchase of Louisiana, Florida, and Alaska, the annexation of Texas, and the acquisition of California, were all deeds of the highest exercise of the powers of nationality and were sanctioned by the supreme law; but to diminish the chances of any one of the expected number of new States west of the Mississippi, and especially of the Pacific States, by the process of disintegration or absorption, I believe would be the exercise of unwise discretion and a measure fraught with dangerous consequences.

Precedent has established the law of purchase, conquest, and annexation of foreign territory.

This has been the salutary law of our expansion, and has led us on securely, with amazing results, to our present greatness; but to reverse this rule and build up mighty States from the organized Territories of the Union would form a precedent which in some great emergency might lead to the destruction of inferior States in the same manner as it is now proposed to destroy a Territory with ample means and just claims to become a State.

Eighth. We will now proceed to note some facts which serve to resolve the pending question into one of great national importance. And first, it should be here observed, that, while two-thirds of the Republic, with only twelve States, lie west of the Mississippi, twenty-six States are embraced in the one-third that lies east of it.

Texas and California are exceptionally large, but no constitutional means exist of compelling a diminution.

It follows, that but seven or eight new States can be added, thus giving but nineteen or twenty at the farthest to the trans-Mississippi number. Why, then, diminish that possible number by striking out Idaho altogether? No argument in support rises from our history and no imperative state reason can be given for the measure; but public policy and public law alike seem to be against it, as we shall more fully see.

Ninth. It is quite remarkable that during a constitutional period of one hundred years, lacking one, no precedent can be found for the course now proposed.

Twenty-five States have been admitted, and the antecedent Territorial rights of each have been definitely fixed and settled by the usages of a century.

The principle and practice have become fundamental law, and should be respected as a final settlement of the grave question now before Congress. Thus, it seems to be reserved for the Territory of Washington and the State of Nevada to make this unexpected and unprecedented attack upon the rights and boundaries of a Territorial organization of twenty-five years' standing for no other reason, so far as we can discover, than to aggrandize each by the spoliation and dismemberment of the great and growing Territory of Idaho.

Tenth. I have already spoken in general terms of the peculiar advantages and resources of Washington Territory, and have shown that the proposed "annexation" will give it the vast dominion from the northern gates of the continent at Puget Sound to the transit of the Bitter Root Mountains, now held by Northern Idaho. Let us now turn to a like consideration of the great State of Nevada. And first, it contains already 110,700 square miles. Add to this enormous surface the proposed absorption from Idaho of 60,000 square miles, it will make a grand total of 170,700 square miles. Why, then, we would ask, this demand for enlargement? This would give her 7 degrees of longitude and almost 10 degrees of latitude in the very heart of the Coast States, bordering on California, already two-thirds larger than it should be. Besides, it is notorious that this enlargement would be a substantial addition to the Golden State, which has in fact so long controlled the magnificent Silver State of Nevada.

The proposition would be totally inadmissible and even startling were Idaho merely the abode of savage tribes of Indians, and not, as it is, the home of civilized and advanced American communities. What, then, shall be said of the enforced transfer of 100,000 people who hold the keys to a mighty Commonwealth? The country will pause for a reply and surrounding States will tremble for their integrity. Nevada has rare possibilities of greatness within herself. The geographical position of the State of Nevada, upon the great tablelands of the northern temperate zone, makes her a favored base for the grasses indigenous to Chili and Peru, and enables her to support vast herds and flocks by the introduction of a little of the enterprise and thrift which make Idaho so desirable an acquisition. Nevada's ailment is not of climate or soil, but is rather to be found in that fatal absenteeism resulting in carrying and scattering mighty accumulations of wealth abroad. This system, if pursued, will hold Nevada to the causes which have tended to her decay, and has prevented her advancement and prosperity in those elements of wealth and power which have characterized her sister States.

If Nevada be in such a condition as to require aid from without to maintain statehood, would it not be a wiser policy for the General Government to make appropriations to develop its resources and enable it to build and construct a system of irrigating canals to utilize its millions upon millions of acres of desert lands, and thus prepare the same for settlement and cultivation?

Idaho has done this without assistance from the revenues of the nation, by the wealth, the energy, industry, and enterprise of its own people.

Eleventh. I wish not to be understood, by the display of square miles in the above outlines, that the population is not after all the essential element of prosperous States. One reference to the census of 1880 will tell more on this subject than a volume of argument. That census shows in round numbers that the increase in the previous decade was near 12,000,000; two-thirds of this immense aggregate, or about 8,000,000, are credited to the States and Territories lying west of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, and Iowa, and 4,000,000 to the east of this line. The coming and centennial census of 1890 will swell this enormous increase to at least 15,000,000, or perhaps 18,000,000. The conclusion to be drawn from these premises will show 10,000,000 of this increase for the West to 5,000,000 for the east in the above lines of division.

As Idaho is just coming into distinction before the migrating people of the world, and as it lies in the track of the great continental lines of railway, and has lands in plenty and exhaustless mines, forests, and rivers, with a climate unexcelled, and a people ever ready to do a great work, I predict our population at the next census will be fully 150,000 souls.

In conclusion, I would appeal to your honorable body to reject the several propositions now before you, having for their object the dismemberment of Idaho.

Very respectfully,

FRED T. DUBOIS,
Delegate for Idaho Territory.

Senator CHARLES F. MANDERSON.

Mr. CULLOM. I shall not detain the Senate longer in discussing the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the amendment of the Committee on Territories.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to state that the amendment first to be voted upon is the amendment offered by myself admitting Washington Territory pure and simple with its original boundaries, without the addition of the four counties of Idaho.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the amendment will be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to amend the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is an amendment to an amendment pending.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will be allowed to offer his amendment notwithstanding it is technically not in order. By unanimous consent I think he may be allowed to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is a proposition to strike out and insert, and it can be perfected. The Senator from Mississippi can offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. GEORGE. I move, in line 3 of section 2, to strike out the word "one" and insert "three;" in the same line, to strike out the word "league" and put in the plural—"leagues." The same motion will be made in order to make the bill harmonious in line 14 of the same section, and also in line 16.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendments of the Senator from Mississippi will be read.

Mr. GEORGE. The point in that amendment is this: The section as it now stands makes the boundary of Washington Territory extend 1 marine league from the shore. My amendment, if adopted, would make it extend 3 marine leagues from the shore. The object of the amendment is to include within the territorial jurisdiction of Washington when it becomes a State the waters within 3 marine leagues from the shore. I move that amendment because I regard it as very important——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi will yield to allow a message to be received from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 8636) for the relief of Isaac N. Enloe;

A bill (H. R. 11262) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Kentucky River and its tributaries by the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine and Beattyville Railroad Company; and

A bill (H. R. 11336) a supplement to an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved the 6th of May, 1882.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. STEWART. I ask the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to yield for a few moments. I should like to ask unanimous consent to have the Chinese bill, which passed the other House this morning and which is short, put upon its passage.

Mr. GEORGE. I yield, certainly, to the Senators who are pressing that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asks that the pending order be temporarily laid aside to consider a bill from the House of Representatives which will be laid before the Senate, if there be no objection.

The bill (H. R. 11336) a supplement to an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved the 6th of May, 1882, was read the first time by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLATT. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read the second time at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any Chinese laborer who shall at any time heretofore have been, or who may now or hereafter be, a resident within the United States, and who shall have departed or shall depart therefrom, and shall not have returned before the passage of this act, to return to or remain in the United States.

SEC. 2. That no certificates of identity provided for in the fourth and fifth sections of the act to which this is a supplement shall hereafter be issued; and every certificate heretofore issued in pursuance thereof is hereby declared void and of no effect, and the Chinese laborer claiming admission by virtue thereof shall not be permitted to enter the United States.

SEC. 3. That all the duties prescribed, liabilities, penalties, and forfeitures imposed, and the powers conferred by the second, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth sections of the act to which this is a supplement, are hereby extended and made applicable to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. That all such part or parts of the act to which this is a supplement as are inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GEORGE. The bill has not been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not.

Mr. STEWART. It has not; but I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that it was unanimously passed by the House of Representatives this morning, and it is rather urgent. The House understands what they are doing, and I hope the Senator will not make any objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. As I caught the reading of the bill, there is one question in it that I should like to have settled. I have been voting all along against Chinese laborers coming to this country, from the very first up to now; but there seems to be an injustice or a possible injustice in the bill arising out of the provision which prohibits the coming into this country of any Chinese who have departed and have not returned at the time of the passage of the act. A Chinaman may be on his way back, he may be almost in sight of our shores, coming under a law and a treaty which allow him to land. It seems to me to be worthy of consideration whether the denial of returning Chinese to come should not be put at a date which would about give them time to get across the Pacific Ocean. I should like to have that matter considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations before I vote upon the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi make a motion that the bill be referred?

Mr. GEORGE. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations if there is objection made to its present consideration.

Mr. DOLPH. That is done on the objection of the Senator from Mississippi?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is a House bill which has been read twice, and the Senator from Mississippi desires to have it referred.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] asked unanimous consent that the bill be taken up for present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] asks that it be referred.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Mississippi objects to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to state to the Senator from Mississippi that the apparent hardship is not a real one, because a treaty was negotiated a long time ago stopping the return to this country of those who go back to China. They have six months in which to return to America. We have retained that treaty for a long time and they have been rushing in very rapidly in the mean time. I think they have had a pretty good show on the return business. Enough of them have been smuggled in. I think the Senator from Mississippi had better withdraw his objection and let the bill pass.

Mr. GEORGE. As my votes and my speeches in this body have shown, I have been all along in favor of a very strict rule to exclude Chinese laborers, but I think the Committee on Foreign Relations, which could act on this matter at any time within twenty-four hours and report it to the Senate, ought to consider whether the case which I put would not be a breach of faith which I think the Government ought to keep with the Chinese laborers.

Mr. MITCHELL. This bill passed the House of Representatives this morning, I understand, unanimously, and it came to the Senate, whereupon the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] moved to lay aside the pending bill that the Senate might proceed to the present consideration of this House bill. He asked unanimous consent for that purpose. Do I understand that the Senator from Mississippi objects?

Mr. GEORGE. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations for their consideration.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Mississippi then objects to the present consideration of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill would naturally go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Unless unanimous consent is given to consider it now, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VEST. I do not understand that the Senator from Mississippi objects to its present consideration. We can determine afterwards what we shall do with it.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to make a statement about it. I have stated my objection——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to state——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair first put the question. The bill having been read twice, the Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that it be now considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Now, I desire to say that I think it would be proper to have that point considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations. If no other Senator agrees with me, of course I shall not make the motion to refer.

Mr. VEST. That is unquestionably the meaning of the bill. I am ready to vote for it myself. I believe in no sort of temporizing or halfway measures on this question. The Government of the United States ought to take a firm position and stand by it. Let these people come here, or else exclude them. If the present system of certificates and the return of Chinamen which follows it is to obtain, let us know it. For one, I am ready to vote for the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that this bill is only here because it is understood that the Chinese Government have declined to accept some modification that was put upon the recent Chinese treaty, or have objected, perhaps, to the entire scope of the treaty. I do not know that our Government have received any notice that the Chinese Government have rejected the treaty. The newspaper reports, by way of London, I believe, assert that the Chinese Government have declined to accept it.

I simply want to say that I am delighted that the Chinese Government have declined to accept the treaty. I am in favor of legislating upon this subject without reference to treaties. I do not think that the Chinese treaty recently negotiated was a valuable treaty. It gave us the privilege of doing for twenty years that which every independent nation on the face of the earth asserts the right to do, to say who shall come here and who shall not.

I repeat that I am glad the treaty has been rejected. I know what the public sentiment of the United States will demand of any and every administration, and that is that this class of people who come here, not to make homes, who come here not to better their condition permanently in any sense, but simply as laborers from day to day, who are brought in close competition with American laborers, shall be absolutely excluded from this country.

There are now about one hundred thousand Chinese who have come into this country, and I myself will welcome any legislation that shall deport every single one of them from the United States and send them back to China, where they belong. I do not regard that as inconsistent with a fair treatment of China, nor do I consider it to be any outrage upon the rights of people to travel and to go abroad, nor do I consider it any outrage upon the right which is generally conceded that every man may select his own residence and his own home, for these people do not come here for that purpose. There never was a Chinaman landed in the United States who did not expect to return to China dead or alive, and in my judgment the sooner they return the better it will be for the American people.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very glad that the Chinese who come to this country do not come with the intention of remaining. I think that would make the immigration of the Chinese much worse than it is now. My objection to the immigration of Chinese into this country is not that they do not stay here, not that they do not become citizens of the United States, but it is based on an entirely different ground. They are an inferior race, unfit for citizenship in the United States and unfit to be competitors with American laborers.

What I suggested was simply whether we had not better have the point to which I referred considered by the proper committee of this body. One of these men holding a paper from the Government of the United States which entitled him to return, having started on his journey, having got within sight of our shores, having expended his money and his time in making the trip, the question is whether under those circumstances he ought to be turned back. That was the point which I desired to have considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

So far as I am concerned, I have been all along opposed to the Chinese coming here for the reasons which I have stated. I do not think they ought to be allowed to come here, and I think if we had any proper way of getting rid of those who are already here we ought to do it.

But as my point does not seem to meet the approbation of any Senator here, and as all seem to think there is nothing in the supposed breach of faith in refusing to a man who had already come within sight of our shores under a paper which gave him the right to land, I will withdraw that objection to the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss this question at this time; but there are two or three things which have been announced publicly during the discussion of this question that I think perhaps ought to be corrected.

One is the statement which has been made that the amendments placed upon the treaty by the Senate were the cause of delay in its ratification or the cause of the rejection of the treaty by the Chinese Government. I took pains to inform myself at the time these amendments were adopted and I learned that the treaty had not yet reached the Chinese Emperor; that it was then in the process of red tape in the treaty bureau; and that the transmission and the consideration of any amendment would not delay the consideration of the treaty at all. Nor have I any information that the amendments were objectionable to the Chinese Government. They simply carried out what the State Department declared in its communication to the Senate to be the real meaning of the treaty——

Mr. TELLER. The Senator is speaking of the Senate amendments?

Mr. DOLPH. I am speaking of the Senate amendments. Those amendments were approved by the Chinese minister here. If those amendments led to the rejection of the treaty by the Chinese Government, if it has been rejected, I am quite willing to take my share of the responsibility of having adopted those amendments, because they placed beyond controversy what was claimed by the State Department to be the real meaning of the treaty and did not leave those questions open for further controversy between the two governments.

Nor have I any information that the treaty has been rejected. I suppose I have seen what other members of the Senate have seen in the dispatches from London. On Saturday the State Department had no information whatever on the subject, and believed that if the treaty had been rejected by China they would have received a cablegram from the American minister in China.

Now, another point, and then I shall be through. When the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations stirred up the question of a treaty last winter and took action upon the matter and reported their resolution, there had not been, as I have very good authority for saying, a scratch of a pen between the two governments in regard to this Chinese treaty since the 1st of the preceding May.

Mr. BUTLER. If not inconvenient, I should be glad to have the bill read again. I happened to be out at the time it was read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read again.

The Secretary again read the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I did not say, as the Senator from Mississippi seems to have understood me, that my objection to Chinese coming to this country is because they do not come to remain. I said they could be deported, or you could stop them from coming, without violating the principle contended for that people have a right to emigrate and to go to any country to make homes wherever they see fit, because these people do not do that. As to their exclusion from this country, very grave reasons could be given why they ought to be excluded.

I do not propose to discuss the Chinese question this afternoon, and I did not rise for that purpose. Years ago, and long before some people who are now very zealous in excluding Chinese had opened their mouths,

I expressed myself very freely on the subject. I have never occupied two sides in this case for the last twenty-five years. I have never believed that it was the proper thing to introduce into the body of our people a foreign people who must forever remain foreign, a people who will not assimilate, who will never become homogeneous, who come here without their families, who contribute nothing at all to the strength or the glory of the nation, who take no part in the religious interests of the country, in its schools, in its asylums, who practically pay no taxes whatever, and whose highest ambition in the world is to return to the country from which they came with whatever they can secure here. My position can not be mistaken upon this point.

I rose simply to emphasize what I had on a former occasion expressed as to the treaty that was recently negotiated, a treaty which I repeat I am glad is not likely to become the supreme law of the land. It is a treaty that in my judgment never ought to have been negotiated, a treaty that fixed a period of twenty years and then left us at the end of twenty years with a controversy as to whether we had a right to exclude Chinese. I welcome the bill because it is an assertion of the right of this Government to exclude any and every class of people who are supposed to be detrimental to the interests of the commonwealth.

That is all I desire to say, Mr. President.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I rise not for the purpose of engaging in this debate or to resist the passage of the bill, but simply to state the action of the Committee on Foreign Relations in respect to Chinese exclusion.

At the beginning of this session of Congress several bills were referred to that committee. They were fully considered. The delegation from the Pacific coast, largely interested in the question, were united without respect to party, and very earnest in opposition to the admission of Chinese. They made representations to the committee that Chinese immigration was offensive to them and dangerous to their civilization, and repeated the arguments which have moved both Houses of Congress heretofore in the passage of restriction bills.

They further said to us that certificates under the previous laws to departing Chinese who were here between the time of the execution of the treaty and the first law were fraudulently used as the means of admitting Chinese who had never been in America at all; and that all the provisions of the law which were intended to ameliorate and modify the harsh requirements of the exclusion were evaded and avoided by fraud, perjury, and other crimes.

Therefore the Committee on Foreign Relations agreed unanimously upon hearing these statements that it was best to make the exclusion absolute. No one doubted the power of the Government of the United States to do that without negotiating a treaty.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will allow me to finish, and then I will hear his question.

Mr. BUTLER. I merely wanted to ask a question for information.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I do not answer it before I get through, I will then answer it.

In respect to the treaty, no one doubted the power of Congress to make a law for the public safety even in violation of a treaty. That power has been recognized by the Supreme Court. It is the undoubted right of every nation to judge of what is necessary for its safety. But it was the general desire of the Committee on Foreign Relations that this should not be done if the Chinese Empire would agree to do it by treaty. It was understood and stated to us that there was no question but that the Chinese Government would agree to such essential modifications of the former treaty as would enable the exclusion to be practically positive and prohibitory.

Thereupon the committee with equal unanimity designated three members of the committee to go to the Secretary of State and see whether a negotiation could be brought about by which this object could be accomplished without a direct act of Congress not in harmony with the existing treaty. A subcommittee did go to Mr. Bayard and had a conversation with him. I never supposed and never believed that Mr. Bayard gave out any remarks that were made in that conference, because it would have been improper for him to do so, and he is not a man who would do a thing of that kind. The effort was not made with any intention to embarrass the Administration or to embarrass Mr. Bayard in the slightest degree. It was made in the most friendly spirit. Among the members of that subcommittee was the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who has been the defender of the Administration and who is more distinctly the representative of the Democratic party on the committee than any one else; he has taken the most active part. He was present and heard all that was said and participated in it.

All that was said or all that was proposed by the subcommittee was that if this thing could be brought about by the action of the executive authorities or the treaty-making power, it would be better as an example for the future than for us to assert the power to pass a law without respect to the treaty.

The newspapers at once by some means or other gave a false color to the interview, and they stated that it was a movement of the Republican party to embarrass the Administration, to put them in a hole, as one of them expressed it, to create public sentiment against the Administration, when nothing of that kind was thought of or intended.

On the other hand, Mr. Bayard did say that there had been some communication with the Chinese Government in respect to a treaty, and he told us the exact state of the negotiation, I have no doubt precisely as it existed; and we urged him to hurry forward that negotiation as fast as possible so as to avoid the necessity of passing a law except in harmony with the treaty. I suppose that in pursuance of that arrangement, without any party feeling, this negotiation was pressed forward, and in the end a treaty was sent to the Senate, although stories were published in the papers that were entirely groundless in regard to the object of that interview.

When the Committee on Foreign Relations received the new treaty and examined it again without much difference of sentiment, although perhaps it was thought on the part of the Democratic members of the committee that it was not necessary to change the terms of the treaty, an amendment had been agreed upon which we understood had also been ratified by the Chinese Government; but it was agreed upon in order to make the treaty clear and explicit, so that there would be no longer any evasion through the courts of the terms of the law. So we added two clauses to the treaty which did certainly make it more explicit, and which I am now satisfied were absolutely essential to carry out the purposes of the Government of the United States. They were adopted in the Senate and sent back, and it was said at once through the general sources of information we have through the newspapers that those amendments were submitted to the Chinese minister and not objected to, and it was supposed that, as a matter of course, they would in due time be ratified.

From the inside history of this matter (and I gather it again from the newspapers, for I have had no official intercourse with the Secretary of State about it) I have no doubt that our treaty relations were complicated by the treaty relations existing between Great Britain and the Chinese Government in respect to Australia. Probably it was found by the Chinese Government that they had gone so far in this regard that they would have to extend the same provision to the British Government in regard to Chinese in Australia, and it may be that they became embarrassed by the situation. Therefore, I suppose they declined to ratify the treaty.

The only thing I have to inquire about is this: I suppose as a matter of course the House of Representatives have information which we have not, that the Chinese Government has refused to ratify the treaty, because I take it that the House of Representatives would never pass a bill of this kind unless they had information of that character; that they never would by unanimous consent pass a bill which practically abrogates all treaties upon the subject of Chinese immigration unless they had been advised that the Chinese Government had declined to accept the amendments of the Senate and to accept the new treaty as it now stands.

But for that supposition I would object to this bill or to any further action upon the matter until we should know the fact; but I assume that, as a matter of course. If it turns out that there is a mistake made, I want it distinctly understood that the blame rests not here with the Senate but with the House of Representatives. If it should appear that the executive authority have not yet heard of the action of the Chinese Government and have not communicated that fact to the House of Representatives, then I would say that the passage of this bill under the circumstances would be wrong, that we ought to wait. But I assume that as a fact, because to assume otherwise would be to imply a wrong by the House of Representatives that I do not believe would be done.

The question simply for us is, there being no treaty, the Chinese Government having declined to agree to the terms of the treaty proposed, whether we shall now take the next step—that is, in pursuance of our power as a nation, declare that the immigration of Chinese laborers is not good policy, is not best for the interests of our country?

Upon that question I am in full accord with the general sentiment of the Senate and of the House and of the people of the United States. Whatever may have been said in the past, there is no doubt a concurrent sentiment in this country that we should prohibit races so distinct, so alien, so different in habits, civilization, religion, and character from ours, from coming to our country, especially when they can not mingle in the body of our population.

Therefore I do not make any objection to the passage of this bill. I hope it will pass, but with the distinct understanding that it is based upon the idea that the Chinese treaty has been rejected by the Chinese Government, and if it should prove otherwise it is not our fault.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. I beg pardon for not yielding to the Senator before, but I did not wish to be interrupted in my statement.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply rose for the purpose of asking the Senator from Ohio, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, whether if this measure should become a law it would not be in direct conflict with an existing treaty between this Government and the Chinese Government?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is inconsistent with the treaty, but as the Chinese Government have declined to make a change in the treaty we have an unquestioned right to pass this proposed law.

Mr. BUTLER. But the point I want to make is whether there is a treaty now existing between the United States and the Chinese Empire with which this bill would come in conflict if it should become a law?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly, because the existing treaty provides for the certificates; they have been issued under existing treaty, and by virtue of those certificates the Chinese have a right to come back here for a certain time and under certain circumstances. It is only because the provisions of the law and the treaty have been violated by fraud and perjury that such a measure as this would be justified. If that had been made clear and manifest to us, we should have reported a bill some months ago, in substance making this same provision, but for the hope that the Chinese Government might acquiesce in it and thus make it in a more orderly and proper way.

Mr. BUTLER. A good deal has been said in the past by way of justification of votes cast by Senators on this floor, that the law proposed was a violation of an existing treaty, and therefore a violation of the Constitution of the United States. I understand the Senator from Ohio to state that this proposed law would be a violation of existing treaties, and therefore a violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I deny the ergo.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I take back the ergo and confine it to the original premise.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is the abrogation of a treaty by law. We have undoubtedly a right to do that. We can not violate the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. I stand corrected as to that. It is not a violation of the Constitution, and my ergo therefore was a mistake; but the justification made for the vote was that the law proposed was a violation of an existing treaty.

Mr. SHERMAN. A change of an existing law.

Mr. TELLER. May I correct the Senator? The word "violation" is not the proper term where there is a legislative displacement of a treaty. "Abrogation" is the proper term.

Mr. BUTLER. That is a matter of argument.

Mr. TELLER. There is a great difference between violation and abrogation.

Mr. BUTLER. I am now discussing the fact that the votes of certain Senators upon this floor have been attempted to be justified because, as is stated, the law proposed was a violation of an existing treaty. Now, I understand the Senator from Ohio to state that this proposed law will be a violation of an existing treaty between the Chinese Government and the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not use the word "violation."

Mr. BUTLER. What is the word, then?

Mr. SHERMAN. "Abrogation," "repeal." We do not violate a law because we repeal it; and a treaty is a law.

Mr. BUTLER. This is an abrogation, then, of the treaty between China and the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a substantial change; it is a repeal of it, you may say, so far as it relates to Chinese immigration.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well. Is this the form in which it was provided that the treaty should be abrogated?

Mr. SHERMAN. It was not, but we can change it. There is no doubt about the power of Congress to repeal a treaty if we choose to exercise that power.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that perfectly well.

Mr. SHERMAN. Every nation has that right.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that perfectly well; but it seems to me that this whole Chinese business has been a matter of political advantage, and we have not been governed by that deliberation which it would seem to me the gravity of the question requires. In other words, there is a very important Presidential election pending. One House of Congress passes an act driving these poor devils into the Pacific Ocean, and the other House comes up and says, "Yes, we will drive them further into the Pacific Ocean, notwithstanding the treaties between the two governments." I want to see our friends upon the other side on the record on that subject. I have been opposed, and I am now, to the introduction of Chinese into this country. I have always been opposed to it, and I will go as far as the Senator from Colorado or any other Senator in excluding them from this country; but I do like to see a little bit of consistency in gentlemen charged with the consideration of such grave matters as are presented to us in this whole question of Chinese immigration. I shall vote for the bill. I am very sorry, however, to be informed by the Senator from Ohio that it is a violation of a treaty.

Mr. TELLER. It is no violation of a treaty.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, that it is an abrogation of a treaty. I am very sorry to do that. I do not believe that the Senate would for one instant consider a proposition of this kind if it related to a strong, vigorous, active power in friendly relations with us.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is the Senator from South Carolina willing to vote for a bill on the subject of Chinese restriction or Chinese exclusion that would in his judgment contravene the provisions or any one of the provisions of an existing treaty?

Mr. BUTLER. Well, I will say yes, under the leadership of my distinguished friend from Oregon, who has certainly not hesitated a moment to abrogate treaties and violate them so far as they relate to Chinese. I will follow in his lead with great pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad the Senator from South Carolina is getting on my platform. I want to ask him another question. In the opinion of the Senator from South Carolina does the pending bill contravene any provision of our existing treaty with China?

Mr. BUTLER. I have no opinion on the subject. I am not informed. Therefore I appealed to the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and he tells me that it does.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not asking what the Senator from Ohio said. We all know what he has said and what he has very correctly said. I want to know what the opinion of the Senator from South Carolina is in reference to the pending bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I can not give an opinion, because I have not investigated the question.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand, then, the Senator from South Carolina is shutting his eyes, blinding himself, and coming forward here (because he has already said he intends to vote for the bill) and voting for a bill in reference to which he has no opinion, when he does not know what it means.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Oregon ought not to complain of that when I tell him very frankly that I place myself under his leadership.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am making no complaint.

Mr. BUTLER. He ought to be content with that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I simply wanted to know where the Senator from South Carolina stands in reference to this question.

Mr. BUTLER. I stand right behind the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is a good place to stand.

Mr. BUTLER. And it gives me great pleasure to follow him. If he leads me astray he must be held responsible and not myself.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am glad if it is true, as reported, that the treaty to which the Senate consented a short time ago has not received the approval of the Chinese Government, and for the reasons stated a moment ago by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. I regard it as a treaty that never should have received the assent of the people of this country or of its treaty-making power, and I do not believe it ever would have received the assent of the Senate even in its amended form, which made it infinitely better than it was when it came here, if any reasonable time had been taken for consideration, so that the sentiment of the people of this country could have been obtained in reference to it. It was acted on very hastily. Personally I opposed its ratification, and have never yet had cause to regret my action in that regard.

The pending bill, which I intend to vote for, because it is a bill which has, through the force of public sentiment, come up very gradually, in a measure approaching closely to the platform I laid down for myself on this subject several years ago, and which I have never ceased to advocate, has no reference whatever to that class of Chinese laborers who have never been in this country. It relates solely and exclusively to those Chinese laborers who have been in this country heretofore and have departed from it, or who are here now and may depart from it hereafter. That is all there is to this bill.

Of course the bill, as all must concede, is in direct contravention of the provisions of the second article of our existing treaty with China. I refer to the Angel-Swift treaty of November 17, 1880. That article provides as follows:

> Chinese subjects, whether proceeding to the United States as teachers, students, merchants, or from curiosity, together with their body and household servants, and Chinese laborers who are now in the United States shall be allowed to go and come of their own free will and accord, and shall be accorded all the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are accorded to the citizens and subjects of the most favored nation.

That is the existing treaty. This bill provides, it will be observed, that Chinese laborers who were in the United States at the date of the making of this treaty, the 17th day of November, 1880, shall not be permitted to go and come of their own free will and accord; that any of that class of laborers who were here on the 17th of November, 1880, and who have heretofore left this country, or who may hereafter leave this country, shall not be permitted to return.

That is this bill, and so far as it goes is a most excellent bill, in my judgment. It is true it abrogates a most important provision of the treaty. The only objection I have to the bill is that it does not go further and abrogate that other provision of the treaty and of the existing law which limits the power of the Congress and inhibits it from the passage of an act to absolutely exclude the immigration of Chinese laborers to this country for all future time. Six years of the time for which immigration has been suspended under existing law have elapsed, I believe. Four years of the time remain. At the expiration of four years, therefore, so far as anything in this bill is concerned, or in the existing treaty or laws of Congress, all the Chinese laborers in Christendom or outside of Christendom may come to this country without let or hinderance.

This bill does not touch that question, which is the great vital question after all in reference to the immigration of Chinese. It does affect, and it only affects, those laborers who are now within the limits of the United States or who have been heretofore at some former time within the limits of the United States. Existing statute law as well as the subsisting treaty declares that all that class of laborers—that is, those who were here November 17, 1880—shall be permitted to return by the presentation of certain certificates authorized by the restriction act. This bill declares that those certificates from and after the passage of this proposed act shall be void, and that no more such shall be issued, and it declares furthermore, as I have said, that no Chinese laborer who has ever been in the United States and has gone away, or who is here now and may go away hereafter shall ever be permitted to return. Therefore, so far as it goes it is a most excellent bill, although to reach that position in the business of excluding Chinese from this country it was necessary, as we must all admit, to contravene, repeal, or abrogate, to use another term, a clause in the second article of the existing treaty. There is and can be no question about that.

While, therefore, I shall vote for this bill cheerfully, I should vote for it much more cheerfully and with much greater alacrity if it went one step further, and provided that no Chinese person, of whatever citizenship or from whatever port or country he may come, whether he had ever been in the United States or whether he was never here, shall, from and after the date of the passage of this bill, be permitted to enter into or remain in the United States of America. If I had my way I would do just what I proposed to do months and months ago by the introduction of the bill which I now hold in my hand. I would abrogate not all our treaties with China, but I would abrogate and repeal (after having made, as we have made from time to time ineffectual efforts to secure better terms by treaty) all those provisions in any and all our treaties with China which restrict Congress and tie up its hands and prevent us from passing a law which would forever exclude all Chinese from this country, excepting diplomatic and consular and other government officials. Inasmuch as Congress has at last, reluctantly, arrived at the conclusion that in order to grapple successfully with this monstrous evil it has become necessary to abrogate, in part at least, our treaty stipulations with China, on the ground that they had become pernicious to the public peace and general welfare, it occurs to me it might have been as well, indeed infinitely better, had we in this measure wiped out of existence every impediment that stands in the way of an absolute iron-clad exclusion act, such as I had the honor of introducing first at the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress and again at the present session.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator a question just there?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator by whom that treaty was made which tied up the hands of Congress?

Mr. MITCHELL. One was made in 1880 under President Hayes's administration, but the treaty which was made a short time since under the present Administration proposed to tie up the hands of Congress to an infinitely greater extent than does the existing treaty.

Mr. BUTLER. May I then ask the question whether the Senate assented to that treaty?

Mr. MITCHELL. To what treaty?

Mr. BUTLER. To the last treaty, which the Senator said proposed to tie up the hands of Congress.

Mr. MITCHELL. It did. I never assented to it, however, personally. I was opposed to it then; I am opposed to it now; and I sincerely hope it will never become an existing treaty between the two countries. But let me tell the Senator from South Carolina that if that treaty had not been amended by the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body and by the Republican majority of the Senate it would have opened wide many doors to Chinese immigration to this country that are not found available to-day under the existing treaty and under existing law.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Senator to say that the door was very wide open before the formation of the recent treaty, and yet that the hands of Congress were tied by former treaties, beginning back with the Burlingame treaty, over which so much-ado was made in this country; and that by every treaty from that time down to the present the hands of Congress have been tied. Yet I understand the Senator now to say that he proposes, as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations proposes, that this body, a part of the treaty-making power of our Government, after having attached its signature in solemn form to a treaty, is prepared to pass a law which he says will abrogate or repeal or contravene the existing treaty. I used the word "violate." That is better English. It expresses more fully and completely exactly what is taking place here. The Senator tones it down. He says "abrogate," "contravene," "repeal." I say, according to the statement of the Senator himself and according to the statement of the Senator from Ohio, that this proposed law is an open, flagrant violation of an existing treaty between this Government and another government with which it is on terms of peace and good-will.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will pardon me one moment——

Mr. MITCHELL. I yielded for a question only. Now, Mr. President, I ask the honorable Senator from South Carolina a question. Does he think or hold that a repeal of an existing law on the statute-book by Congress is a violation of that law?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator uses the terms "contravene," "abrogate," and "repeal." He uses a number of those synonymous terms.

Mr. MITCHELL. What does the Senator from South Carolina say it is?

Mr. BUTLER. I am very sorry to admit that I have not information enough on the subject to express an opinion. It is humiliating to admit it, but it is true. We had better discuss some subject that we know something about.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator admits, however, that he is willing to pass a law to contravene a treaty, and that he intends to vote for this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it is a game of politics, this whole business, and not a very seemly one, either, I must say. But for the fact that we are on the eve of a Presidential election and each party wants to get the vote of the Pacific Slope, this Senate would not be engaged in this debate.

Mr. TELLER. How about the House of Representatives?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Colorado asks, "How about the House of Representatives?" Why, Mr. President, the House is not a part of the treaty-making power of this Government, except so far as it may appropriate money to carry a treaty into effect.

Mr. TELLER. It is part of the law-making power, and has sent this bill here.

Mr. BUTLER. It has sent it here, and the Republican Senate wants to go the House one better, that is all. We do not need to disguise it. We may want to cover up our purpose and say that it is a repeal and an abrogation, etc., of an existing treaty, but we do not need to dodge it.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator admit that the bill was introduced in the other House for the purpose of politics?

Mr. BUTLER. Well, I think it very likely. [Laughter.]

Mr. TELLER. The Senator thinks it was.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it very likely; and the Republican Senate, a part of the treaty-making power of this Government, is simple enough to come in and say: "Yes, we will see that play," and, if I may borrow an expression that is not very elegant, "we will go you one better." That is all there is of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senate of the United States is not sitting to-day in the capacity of a treaty-making body.

Mr. BUTLER. It is not to-day, but it has done so in the past.

Mr. MITCHELL. I decline to yield further.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senate is not sitting to-day, I repeat, as a part of the treaty-making power. It is sitting as part and parcel of the legislative branch of the Government. A Democratic House of Representatives has passed a bill and sent it to the Senate, and the Senate is now considering that bill. The Senator says that the bill, if it is a repeal of the treaty or of any provision of the treaty, is a violation of the treaty. He can designate it as he pleases, but we all understand that Congress has as much power, so far as the question of power is concerned, to repeal a treaty as it has to repeal a law. That has been decided over and over again by the Supreme Court of the United States. So it is a waste of words to be talking about that.

I simply desire to call the attention of the Senate and of the country, if you please, to the fact that this bill, while it does go so far as to contravene an important provision in the existing treaty between this country and China, while it is a repeal of a portion of an existing treaty with China, it only goes to the extent of regulating the coming to this country of those Chinese laborers who are now here or who have been here some time in the past. That is all there is of it; and it occurs to me that when the Democratic House thought it necessary to present a bill that will repeal or abrogate a provision of an existing treaty, they ought to have gone a little further and made the bill more effective and covered the whole ground.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, Mr. President, I——

Mr. MITCHELL. As far as I am concerned, however——

Mr. BUTLER. I would suggest——

Mr. MITCHELL. I am thankful for this much of a bill, and not wishing to delay the matter, I shall offer no amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I was going to suggest——

Mr. MITCHELL. One moment. I hope we shall proceed with the consideration of this bill and pass it this evening, and send it to the President of the United States to be signed, and we shall then have made some advance perhaps on the question of Chinese exclusion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is open to amendment as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, it would be very hard indeed to frame a bill which looked to the more thorough exclusion of the Chinese from the Pacific Slope or from any part of our country, that was framed with any regard to the English language and was capable of meaning what it said, that I would not support and vote for, even though it should in its terms and effect abrogate (or repeal, that is the proper word) a treaty existing between this country and China

I have had my own convictions, Mr. President, on this great subject, for it is a great subject, and I do not think that it is one that concerns mere partisan politics. I have had my convictions for a good while very thoroughly fixed as to what was the true policy of this country and the right of this country in protecting itself and its people in this regard. I in common I believe—though whether or not that is so would not have affected my position and my belief—but in common I believe with a great majority of the party with which I have acted in this country, the Democratic party, I was willing to support any measure that looked to the protection of my country from this admixture of an alien and semi-barbaric race that came into, not competition in the proper sense of the term with the people of our country, but came here alongside of them, without sympathy, without anything of tradition or habits, religion or customs that were common between them, to interfere and disturb, supersede and destroy the labor and the interests of those who have made this country what it is, and to whom and on whom the future of this country belongs and depends. I mean the great white race.

I believe that a question such as this transcends in importance any question of mere party politics. It underlies it and sweeps over it, and for that reason it challenges the attention and careful consideration of any one charged with a public duty in this country.

Therefore, Mr. President, when this treaty was sent to us by the Executive, months and months ago, I hailed it with delight, not as a partisan treaty, not as a measure of a partisan administration, but one that was intended to conserve the truest interests of this country and of all its people. And, sir, I here assert that if that treaty had been promptly ratified in the spirit in which it was framed and sent to this body the very results of which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] has spoken as being desired by him and as being sought to be accomplished by this bill would have been long ago accomplished by the simple ratification of this treaty itself. I assert that the amendments placed upon this treaty, and which now we have reason to fear (so far as we may accept some reports current in the daily papers within the last day or two) jeopard the ratification of this treaty by the Chinese Government, did not add at all to the protection that this treaty gave to the inhabitants of this country on the Pacific Slope or anywhere else. They were merely cumulative. They were placed there (and I say this with all respect for whoever placed them there) by way of greater caution, but they add nothing——

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. GRAY. One moment. They added nothing, I say, to the prohibitive force of the treaty, and did not strengthen it one iota in the effect which it was intended to have and which it undoubtedly would have if it had been ratified.

Mr. MITCHELL rose.

Mr. GRAY. One moment.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me, right there?

Mr. GRAY. Just one moment——

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to ask the Senator a question right at that point.

Mr. GRAY. Not just now, please. Article I of the treaty—I believe this treaty has been published.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, yes.

Mr. GRAY. Article I of the treaty provides—

The high contracting parties agree that for a period of twenty years beginning at the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, the coming, except under conditions hereinafter specified, of Chinese laborers to the United States shall be absolutely prohibited.

That was the wording of Article I as it came to the Senate. The English language could not go further in emphatic words of positive exclusion than this article does.

The amendment put upon it by the Senate, which delays its ratification, if it has not destroyed the hope of ratification, is this:

And this prohibition shall extend to the return of Chinese laborers, who are not now in the United States, whether holding return certificates under existing laws or not.

Now, surely those words added nothing to the prohibitive force of the treaty as it came to the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me now?

Mr. GRAY. Not now, if the Senator please, because it interrupts the line of my argument. I will give way to the Senator in a moment.

Now, Article II (without reading it) provides that this exclusion shall not apply to the return to the United States of any Chinese laborer who has a lawful wife or child or parent in the United States or property therein of the value of $1,000 or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement.

Nevertheless—

The article goes on—every such Chinese laborer shall, before leaving the United States—

Before he leaves the United States, observe—deposit, as a condition of his return, with the collector of customs of the district from which he departs, a full description in writing of his family, or property, or debts as aforesaid, and shall be furnished by said collector with such certificate of his right to return under this treaty as the laws of the United States may now or hereafter prescribe and not inconsistent with the provisions of this treaty; and should the written description aforesaid be proved to be false, the right of return thereunder, or of continued residence after return, shall in each case be forfeited.

So that the exception from this absolute and universal exclusion is in regard only to those Chinese who have their families here or property here of the value of $1,000 and who have left, first having obtained a certificate such as is described in Article II. Therefore it was idle to argue, and is to-day idle to argue, that under this treaty a Chinaman who had gone, before this ratification, to China, could return, for it was impossible for him to have had this certificate which it was required he should have in accordance with the laws to be thereafter passed to entitle him to such return.

Therefore, Mr. President, I think I am justified in saying that in my zeal and eager desire to see a prohibition that would amount to something go into force, I hailed with satisfaction this treaty, which provided for and secured this prohibition. I did not have the less satisfaction that that prohibition so secured was not violative of any pre-existing treaty, for it was secured by a treaty to which both powers, of course, were parties, and therefore this fact would remove all scruples from those who were against voting for a law which, accomplishing the same results, can only accomplish them by violating or repealing the provisions of an existing treaty. Therefore I deprecated the action of the Senate in putting an amendment to this treaty which has delayed months and months its going into effect, and may perhaps, as I have said, jeopard its ratification at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Delaware has declared in the most positive manner that the amendments made to the treaty that we are speaking about added nothing whatever to its prohibitory power; that they were merely cumulative and tautological, and that they did not change the meaning.

Now, Mr. President, if that is all so, I want to know from the Senator from Delaware how that amendment when merely cumulative, making no change in the meaning, can be assigned by any kind of reason, by the Chinese Government or by anybody else, as a reason for a refusal to accept the treaty when they were willing to accept it before the amendment was made?

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, what effect the sending back of that treaty with that amendment on it may have had upon the Chinese Government I do not know, but it made delay, it gave them time to reconsider this question, perhaps, as to whether they had not conceded too much to the Government of these United States; and if I may take a suggestion floating in the newspapers that would perhaps answer, not authoritatively it is true, but answer the question of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] sufficiently for my purpose, it is this: That since the framing of this treaty and its being signed by the President of the United States and the Emperor of China a ship-load of Chinese have been sent back from Australia to China, and the attention of the Chinese Government has been called by the Government of Great Britain to the fact that they, in their colonies of Australia and others in the Pacific Ocean, are unprotected against Chinese immigration, and they have demanded I suppose some such protection as is given to the United States by this treaty. And the Chinese Government if I may conjecture—which is all I can do—may very properly say, "If we are to have all countries coming down upon us and demanding the same thing, we are not willing to place ourselves in a condition of degradation before the whole world, to exclude our inhabitants and prohibit them from putting foot on any land except their own, and therefore the United States not having seen fit to promptly ratify this treaty that we have made securing absolute prohibition so far as they are concerned, we will take the opportunity they give us and withdraw our assent." That is a mere conjecture, but not without plausibility and not without probability, and is the substance of what I see floating in the newspaper press of Friday and Saturday last.

Therefore it was a dangerous thing in the view of those who had this matter at heart, as I have it at heart, to have made any delay at all in ratifying this treaty that for the first time by the treaty-making power secured absolute exclusion of the Chinese.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then, according to the Senator from Delaware, it was not the amendment of the Senate that has prevented the acceptance of this treaty by China, but the trouble in Australia.

Mr. STEWART. If the amendments were what caused the rejection of the treaty, I think the amendments were proper. Part of that Chinese treaty I was delighted with, because it was a step in the right direction. It contained provisions, however, which were very liable to be taken advantage of and were looked upon by those who understood the Chinese character as unfortunate. The second article begins as follows:

The preceding article shall not apply to the return to the United States of any Chinese laborer who has a lawful wife, child, or parent in the United States, or property therein of the value of $1,000, or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement.

It would be very difficult to shut out the Chinese with that privilege; it would be very difficult to meet their arts and devices; so difficult that it was thought in the first place by those familiar with their character that it was worse than the former treaty. But great care was taken in the preparation of the bill that was passed the other day; that, it was thought, would probably remedy the evil of that provision. Then the amendment to the second article is this, after providing that they might return:

And no such Chinese laborer shall be permitted to enter the United States by land or sea without producing to the proper officer of the customs the return certificate herein required.

That was deemed by those familiar with their character on the Pacific coast a very essential provision. They said that the courts would construe the Chinese treaty as they did all the laws, and Chinamen coming and desiring to enter would be allowed to come in by parol evidence, and one of the difficulties that have been experienced on the Pacific Slope and which have brought to the courts a great deal of trouble is that parol evidence was all that was necessary to show previous residence. The difficulty of excluding Chinese laborers upon that state of things, depending upon parol evidence, was what suggested that amendment. Without it a Chinaman coming would be able to prove the loss of a certificate, and could make a great deal of trouble for the courts and for everybody.

The first article provided:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree that for a period of twenty years, beginning with the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, the coming, except under the conditions hereinafter specified, of Chinese laborers to the United States shall be absolutely prohibited.

The best lawyers on the Pacific coast said that will be construed in connection with our law; there are a great many of these Chinamen out that have not the right under existing law to return, and that is liable to be construed as referring naturally to those that should hereafter come in—another liability of construction which might embarrass the courts; and they were anxious that there should be a provision against it. These amendments were not made in a spirit of caprice.

I was inclined in the first place to take the treaty as it was and to rely on legislation. But after hearing their arguments I thought it best to make these amendments.

Mr. President, I am so much delighted with the action of the House of Representatives to-day that I can not have it in my heart to find fault with anybody. This shuts the door absolutely for five years, and I do not think it will ever be opened. There has been an allusion to the fact that this was a political move. I take it that political considerations may have had some effect on both sides, and I am glad they have. The sentiment of the people on this great question ought to have an influence upon Congress. The sentiment among all the people who have had experience is that Chinese immigration is one of the greatest evils that can be inflicted upon our people; and this legislation is in response to a public sentiment which is equal in both parties, an honest public sentiment, accomplishing a great good. We have been paltering with the question. Now we are shutting the door for five years, and it is a matter that Congress should be congratulated upon. Congress should be congratulated also upon the fact that it has acted in response to public sentiment, and I am glad that that sentiment is such that it has been heard in Congress and that all parties regard it. The only way to keep Chinese out is to stop them, to shut the door.

The Chinese Government have held back this treaty for the last six months, and they have allowed every Chinaman to come here who wanted to come to evade our laws, and they are being evaded daily. The Chinese have had notice enough. They have known for the last six months that there was a treaty pending which prohibited their coming here and that there was legislation contemplated, and if they started they started in order to evade the well-known intention of this country and to evade also the agreement with China, namely, that they should be excluded.

I congratulate the country, Mr. President, upon the fact that we are now to pass a law that shall shut this door absolutely for five years. I am confident there will be no difficulty in keeping them out after we once get the proper legislation.

I hope this bill will pass. If it is for political purposes it is for good political purposes. It is in response to the universal and just sentiment which would preserve this country for the white race, for the American people.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I have heard it stated to-day in the Senate, and have seen that it was stated elsewhere, that the amendments to this treaty had delayed its ratification by the Chinese Government. I wish to say that there is no proof of that. There is no information from any source which justifies that statement. The Chinese minister could not agree absolutely to the treaty; it had to be transmitted to China for ratification. It is true the text was transmitted—I suppose it was, I understood it was transmitted—to China before being ratified by the Senate; but the Senate amendments were cabled at once to China, and if there was any opposition in the United States to the amendments it did not come from any representative of the Chinese Government. The Chinese minister favored the amendments, agreed to them, and recommended their adoption to the Chinese Government.

Besides, at the time the treaty was ratified by the Senate it had not reached the Chinese Emperor, it was still in what was called the Bureau of Treaties; it was still undergoing the red-tape process. So before the treaty was considered there they had before them the ratification of the United States and the amendments as they were cabled, and everybody knows it would take but a short time to get the information before them. The Chinese minister had information at the time of these amendments and was satisfied with them.

One thing more. I do not care to discuss the question, but I will simply say that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] undertook to draw a distinction between the act of 1882 and this act and objected to certain provisions which were said to be a violation of the treaty. I do not see any comparison whatever between them. In November, 1880, we had secured a treaty with the Chinese modifying the Burlingame treaty on the subject of admitting Chinese into this country. We were professing then to legislate within the treaty; we were not proposing to abrogate the provisions of a treaty.

But how is it now? The treaty has been in force eight years. The laws that we have passed have been ineffectual. The Chinese have evaded all the laws. We amended the act of 1882 in 1884, but it was not sufficient. The Senate passed a bill in 1886, which the House of Representatives would not take up and act upon, intended to provide for further protection against Chinese immigration under the treaty. The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations undertook to amend the treaty last winter, and when they communicated with the State Department it was found that not a line had passed between the State Department and the Chinese Government since the 1st of May preceding.

The Senate passed a resolution requesting a negotiation, requesting that a treaty be negotiated. The committee reported a bill before any treaty was negotiated, which was left on the Calendar waiting for the treaty to be negotiated. A treaty was negotiated which was unsatisfactory to the majority of the Senate and to a majority of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was claimed by the Administration and has been claimed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] that the amendment had made no change, and that it was no more efficient than the treaty would be without it. I concur with my colleague that it was not an efficient treaty. The Senate took occasion to amend it, and a bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations and sent to the House. The bill was reported in the House first, but it was because it was printed for the use of the committee; it was the Senate bill. What did the House do? They made it to repeal the act of 1884 and the act of 1882, as well as to make the repeal take effect after the ratification of the treaty. The House sent us a bill containing these very obnoxious provisions that have been referred to here, repealing the provisions which provided that no court should have power to naturalize Chinese citizens. The House sent us that bill, and I moved to concur in the Senate, not understanding what the House had done, and not observing that the act of 1882 was included as well as the act of 1884 in the repealing clause. I should have explained it to the Senate if I had observed it. There never was any sense or reason in that provision of the bill. The treaty itself provided that Chinese should not be naturalized, and the Revised Statutes exclude them from naturalization. The provision was placed in the bill of 1882 for political purposes and nothing else. As I have stated, I should have explained it to the Senate if I had observed it.

The Chinese Government seems now to have refused to ratify this treaty and the Senate and House both are willing to legislate within the purview of the existing treaty. The Senator from Ohio assumes, and I assume, that the State Department has more information to-day than it had on Saturday, and that the House of Representatives has had more communication with the State Department than we have had. Now, what do we say? Why, that if the Chinese Government do not agree to our amendments of the treaty, then we agree to abrogate the former treaty; that is all. But there is no parallel whatever with the act of 1882. We are trying to carry out the treaty and to see whether the amendment will answer our purpose. There is no comparison whatever between the act of 1882 and this act.

Mr. VEST. I have no idea whatever that the House of Representatives has any special information on this subject. I have not the slightest impression that any such information has been obtained by the House or any member of it.

But I wish to say that this scene to-day is the most striking illustration in the political history of the United States of the growth of public opinion in this country. Those of us who went through the fight of 1883, which settled the Chinese question forever on this continent, know that there were two positions taken with regard to that act; in fact both the first and second acts—the one which, after being passed, was vetoed by President Arthur and the act that came from the House and was approved by President Arthur after passing the Senate. There were two positions taken by the opponents of those two measures, and we fought it out upon those two positions to a finish, and we did finish, and the crystallized result is seen in the public opinion of the people of the United States to-day.

What were those two positions? The first was that the act violated the treaty with China known as the Burlingame treaty. That treaty provided for a reasonable restriction as to Chinese laborers. The bill that was introduced and was under the control of the Senator from California, Mr. Miller, now deceased, provided a restriction upon Chinese immigration for twenty years. The position was taken that that was an unreasonable restriction and violated the treaty; and the present occupant of the chair [Mr. INGALLS] moved to strike out that provision and insert ten years. That was the first objection.

The second objection was on broad—I was about to say æsthetic, but I will not use that word—the broad philosophical objection made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] conspicuously, who led the opposition to the bill, that it violated the Declaration of Independence, the old position taken by Charles Sumner when he moved to strike out the word "white" in that parliamentary contest to which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] alluded the other day. It was contended that this was a home of refuge for the people of all nationalities, and that if we passed this bill it would violate that great right of finding here a universal home, as it applied to the people of the whole earth, and we had arguments taken from scripture and arguments taken from international law to sustain that proposition.

The votes in the Senate and in the House of Representatives disposed of those two questions, and the Chinese controversy ended in 1883, ended as absolutely and completely as the institution of slavery went out of existence as a result of the late war. That was the end of it.

It is contended now that in 1884, when we passed an amendatory act, and in 1886, when we passed an act that went to the House but did not become a law, and on which the yeas and nays were not called, therefore the Senators who opposed the act of 1883 assented to the subsequent legislation of 1884 and 1886.

Mr. TELLER. Eighteen hundred and eighty-two, the Senator means.

Mr. VEST. No; the act of 1884 I am speaking of.

Mr. TELLER. The act of 1882 the Senator refers to when he speaks of the act of 1883.

Mr. VEST. Well, I call that the act of 1883—the act passed three weeks after the first act was vetoed. The second act came from the House.

Now, as a conspicuous instance of the truth that Senators who opposed the legislation of 1882 (adopting that date now for the time being), did not give their consent to subsequent legislation, but simply acquiesced in it at the time. If I am not mistaken the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who led the fight in 1882, went back to his constituents and told them that he did not agree with the subsequent legislation, but that the opinions of the people of the United States seemed to be crystallized against him, and that therefore he acquiesced simply because he could not help the result. That is the condition of this question to-day.

The question, Mr. President, is settled, it is completed, it is ended, and the only thing for us to do now is to carry out the absolutely fixed opinion of the people of the United States against the introduction of Chinese into this country.

It is useless now, sir, in the face of this result to talk of the effect of treaties, whether of treaties that have been made or treaties that are pending. The statutes of the United States will remain to the end of time against these people coming in, whether right or wrong, whether they violate the Declaration of Independence or violate treaties. There is no sort of question but that the public opinion of this country has settled forever this whole controversy.

I simply propose not to have any more bills on this question passed through the Senate without having the yeas and nays recorded upon them. I propose to have the yeas and nays, because of the argument that has been made here that inasmuch as the yeas and nays were not called on the act of 1884 or the act of 1886, therefore everybody acquiesced in them. I will vote in favor of this bill, occupying the same position that I have ever occupied since I have been a member of the Senate.

I want to say, and that is the principal reason for my rising, that in calling for the yeas and nays I shall not do it as an opponent of the bill, but in order that every Senator may put himself on record now in favor of or against the measure.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, when I made the inquiry whether this bill would violate a treaty I had no idea that the question would bring up such a discussion as has taken place; but as that has been gone into a good deal I propose now to show somewhat the attitude of parties in reference to this question from the very beginning.

In the first place I want to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that until the treaty of 1868 was made, commonly called the Burlingame treaty, there were no Chinese laborers in this country, and they had no right to come to this country.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Do I understand the Senator to say that until 1868 there were no Chinese laborers in this country?

Mr. GEORGE. None of any consequence. That was the first law or treaty that ever gave them the right to come.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Why, sir, there were many thousands of them in this country at that time and had been for fifteen years prior to that.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well; but they were here without any treaty right and without any law of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator say that there should be a law to enable a Chinaman to come to this country any more than anybody else?

Mr. GEORGE. I say there was no treaty right bearing on this people which bound us——

Mr. TELLER. Was there any law?

Mr. GEORGE. There was no treaty right which prevented us from using our discretion in the matter.

Mr. TELLER. Was there any law to prevent their coming?

Mr. GEORGE. None in the world, so far as I know, but there was no treaty which gave them a right or invited them to come, or tied the hands of Congress or of the Executive or of any other department of our Government in reference to them. In other words, a good deal has been said in this debate about closing the door against Chinese immigration. I propose to show now who opened the door and who fastened it open after they got it open.

The United States of America—

I read now from the fifth article of the treaty of 1868, negotiated by William H. Seward and Anson Burlingame.

The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of free migration and immigration of—

What?

of their citizens—

That is, the citizens of the United States and of China—and subjects respectively from the one country for the purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents.

That was the door that was opened for the admission of the Chinese into this country by a treaty right, under a treaty negotiated by Mr. Seward and by Mr. Burlingame, and ratified by a Senate of which three-fouths of the members belonged to the Republican party. And in that treaty, sir, it is stated to be, as I have read, an inherent right on the part of the Chinese to come to this country, not only for the purposes of trade and curiosity, but for permanent residence. That is the door, sir, that was opened up, which Senators on the other side of the Chamber seem now so anxious to close.

A great many Chinese came in through that door thus opened by the Republican party. They were found to be an unsuitable addition to our population; they were found to be competing with our laboring people upon the Pacific coast, and in 1880 another treaty was negotiated, also by Republicans, for the purpose of giving us what we had surrendered by the treaty of 1868—a right to put some limit upon the importation or immigration of Chinese into this country. That treaty was negotiated, and then we had some legislation for the purpose of carrying out that treaty, a history of which I have in my hand, collated and prepared by a distinguished Democrat of the other House, Hon. WILLIAM D. BYNUM, of Indiana.

That was the first effort to restrict Chinese immigration into this country. The Republican party had said the Chinese had an inherent and inalienable right to come—a right that inhered in them as men, a right which they could not alienate, a right which it would be an outrage on the part of any people in the world to deprive them of. That is what it meant by an inherent and inalienable right.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator from Mississippi think that that inalienable right is a right which authorizes or empowers its possessor to interfere with the inalienable rights of others? Does he hold because the right is inalienable to migrate that it also implies by the possession of that right on the part of the immigrant that he may go where he interferes with a possessory right of the same character—a right to life, liberty, and property on the part of others?

Mr. GEORGE. Is the Senator through with his question?

Mr. BLAIR. I am through with that question.

Mr. GEORGE. Well, I want to answer that question now before the Senator puts another.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well, I should like to hear the Senator's answer.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I take no such position as that. I take this position, or rather I have stated the position of the Republicans. They took the position in the treaty I have read that the right to emigrate, the right of a man to change his home and to change his allegiance was an inherent and inalienable right.

Mr. BLAIR rose.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like the Senator to let me go on. I do not want to be interrupted now.

Mr. BLAIR. I simply wish to say——

Mr. GEORGE. I object to being interrupted now. I claim the floor, and I want to go on with my remarks.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not object to the Senator having the floor; he ought not to feel so restive about it.

Mr. GEORGE. I ought not to feel what?

Mr. BLAIR. I say the Senator ought not to feel so restive about it, because he can have the floor so far as I am concerned.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not restive about it.

Mr. BLAIR. It is a custom that has obtained in the Senate for a long time to yield the floor for a question.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not at all in the light of the Senator; if I am

I beg his pardon. There is no man in the United States to whom I wish to be more polite.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that, and I stand in the same relation to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. Well, now let me proceed.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I know that I am giving the Senator from New Hampshire a little history now, and it is not very ancient, either.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope the Senator will proceed now.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well; I shall proceed.

The United States and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and the inalienable right of a man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantages of free migration and immigration of their citizens and subjects—

The citizens of the United States and the subjects of the United States, if we can apply that term to them, and the subjects of the Emperor of China, respectively—from one country to the other for the purposes of curiosity or trade or of permanent residence.

That is the doctrine which was announced as the doctrine of the Republican party in the treaty of 1868.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. I object to being interrupted now.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator will desire——

Mr. GEORGE. I must object to being interrupted.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator will allow me to correct him.

Mr. GEORGE. I am reading from the treaty, and when I read from a treaty I suppose my reading needs no correction. I am not suppressing any of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator is——

Mr. GEORGE. I must again object to being interrupted.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator has misstated the facts.

Mr. GEORGE. I have not misstated the facts. That, Mr. President, is the doctrine of the Republican party. That was the door which the Senator from Oregon and some other Senators on that side of the Chamber meant when they said the door ought to be closed. It was a door made by the Republican party, it was a door that the Republican party solemnly contracted with China that we should not close without a breach of faith.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator will certainly——

Mr. GEORGE. I object to being interrupted.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator will certainly yield for a correction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). The Senator from Mississippi has the floor, and should be allowed to proceed unless he gives way to another Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. I stated the matter correctly, and if the Senator from Oregon is not satisfied with my statement of it he may correct it after I get through.

Mr. MITCHELL. I shall certainly do so, Mr. President.

Mr. GEORGE. That is the door which the Senators are so anxious to close, they having opened it and having bound the Government in a solemn treaty not to close it.

That was the first treaty on the subject. These Mongolians, these people whom I have heard Senators on the other side of the Chamber say were not homogeneous with our people, but were alien in race and in religion, flocked over here, and came by the thousands. They crowded the honest American laborer; they made it hard, by their competition, for him to live, and there was complaint. There was complaint in 1879, before the other treaty was made, and an effort was made to correct it. Now, let us see how that effort was made. Who made it—who were the men—what party undertook to close the door which had just been made by the treaty of 1868 for the admission of these Chinese?

I read from proceedings in the House of Representatives January 28, 1879, on a bill to restrict Chinese immigration. The "yeas" on that bill were 101 Democrats, 51 Republicans; "nays" 16 Democrats, 56 Republicans. So the number of Democrats who voted for the bill were double that of Republicans, and the vote against the bill consisted of three times as many Republicans as Democrats. That was in the House of Representatives. Then the bill came to the Senate. When it came to the Senate let us see how it stood. There were for the bill 22 Democrats and 9 Republicans. Against the bill there were 8 Democrats and 20 Republicans. That is the way the number stood then in reference to closing the door. That bill was passed. Then the Republican President, Mr. Hayes, vetoed the bill. On overturning his veto there were in the affirmative 83 Democrats and 22 Republicans, about four Democrats to one Republican, while for sustaining the veto of the President there were 15 Democrats and 81 Republicans, nearly six times as many Republicans as there were Democrats. So the bill did not pass. There was not a two-thirds vote for it, and therefore this door that the Republican Senators are now so anxious to close, by their own votes and by the veto of their own President was kept open.

The next time it came up was on March 9, 1882, on the bill to restrict Chinese immigration. Another effort was made to close the door which the Republicans had made wide and high, and had locked by the pledged faith of the Government, locked it open (not locked it shut), and fastened it. The next time the effort was made to close this door, which had been opened by the Republican party and labeled right over its lintel with the words, "We acknowledge the inherent and inalienable right of the Chinese to come to this country not only for curiosity and trade but for permanent residence" (and I will get to that "permanent residence" directly, to show what they wanted to use it for then), the vote in the Senate for the bill was 30 Democrats and 8 Republicans, nearly four to one—30 Democrats in opposition to this idea ingrafted in the treaty of 1868, that there was an inherent and inalienable right in the Chinese to come to this country, not only for labor and trade and for curiosity, but for permanent residence. There were just eight Republicans who were assisting them to do that. Let us see who were the party of eight Republicans who were assisting to close this door. I will name them: Mr. Cameron, of Wisconsin; Mr. HALE, of Maine; Mr. Hill, of Colorado; Mr. JONES, of Nevada; Mr. Miller, of California; Mr. Miller, of New York; Mr. SAWYER, of Wisconsin, and Mr. TELLER, of Colorado. I do not see in those eight the name of Mr. Harrison, of Indiana, though he was then a member of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Mississippi please state what he is reading from?

Mr. GEORGE. I am reading from a table made out and published in the speech of Mr. BYNUM, a member of the House of Representatives from Indiana.

Mr. TELLER. What does it purport to be? A vote on what?

Mr. GEORGE. The one I have last read?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. The vote in the Senate on March 9, 1882, on Senate bill No. 71, to restrict Chinese immigration for twenty years.

Mr. TELLER. Am I put down there as voting against that bill?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir; the Senator from Colorado is one of the humble 8 Republicans [laughter] who helped the 30 Democrats to close the door. Senator Harrison was not one of them. Let us see whether he has voted on the other side or not. He seems not to have voted either way. If he had been filled with that spirit which now animates the Senators on the other side of the Chamber, that whether violating treaties, abrogating treaties, or otherwise, this door must be closed, he would have been present and voting, but he did not vote. His vote is not recorded.

Oh, I am mistaken; he is recorded. I beg pardon. In the hurry I overlooked his name. Among the nays is Harrison, of Indiana, but there is a star by his name and at the bottom of the page there is a foot-note which says "paired." So I suppose he did not vote, but he was paired, and paired, I believe, with Mr. Maxey, the former colleague of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE]. So, according to the usages of the Senate, as we all understand, he was here, though absent, and though not present was voting.

That bill was passed. It encountered a little difficulty, too, at the other end of the Avenue, and that difficulty was the veto of a Republican President. If the Republicans had voted in the same proportion for that bill as the Democrats did, they would have passed it over the President's veto. Here is the vote in the House of Representatives, March 23, 1882, on the Senate Chinese restriction bill: Democrats, 98; Greenbackers, 8; Republicans, 61; nays, 4 Democrats and 62 Republicans, fifteen times as many Republicans as Democrats. I believe that was the first vote in the House of Representatives. Now I come to the veto of the President. The vote in the Senate, April 5, 1882, to pass the Senate bill over the President's veto was 31 Democrats voting to overturn the veto and 6 Republicans. Those 6 Republicans were Cameron of Wisconsin, Hill of Colorado, JONES of Nevada, Miller of California, Miller of New York, and TELLER of Colorado; and not one Democrat voted to sustain the veto of the President. Let us see who the nays were, those who were voting not to pass the bill over the President's veto. Of these, there were Republican 28 and 1 Independent. That was in the Senate.

On April 17, 1882, the vote was taken in the House of Representatives, and 103 Democrats came up and voted to close this door which the Republican party had opened on the Pacific coast for the admission of the Chinese, and 91 Republicans. There were 3 Democrats who voted to keep the door open—just 3—and there were 34 Republicans.

Now, to show you, Mr. President, that this Republican doctrine announced in the treaty of 1868 about the inherent and inalienable right of Chinese to come to this country for curiosity, for trade, and for permanent residence, was shared in by a large majority, as late as 1882, of the Republican members of this body, I will read some votes on certain propositions connected with that bill.

The following sections were in the House bill when sent to a Republican Senate by a Democratic House of Representatives:

SEC. 14. That hereafter no State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship; and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Before that time there had been, as I learn, naturalization of certain Chinese somewhere in this country.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator if he will state where and when?

Mr. GEORGE. I learned on the discussion of that matter that there had been, and that this was necessary in order to remove all doubt on that subject.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator further if he does not know that the very treaty which had been made in 1880 provided against it?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know any such thing, and I will correct the Senator on that subject. The treaty did not provide any such thing.

Mr. TELLER. A statute before that had been passed. It did not include——

Mr. GEORGE. Talk about the treaty—one thing at a time. I will settle the treaty matter now.

But nothing herein contained shall be held—

What? To authorize Chinese subjects to be naturalized under the laws of the United States? No.

shall be held to confer naturalization—

A right which under the Constitution of the United States can not be conferred by a treaty. If you look at the Constitution, you will see that Congress has power to pass uniform naturalization laws; but treating with a foreign power, a despot who had no limitations upon his power, no constitutional restrictions, it was necessary to put in the treaty that nothing herein should be held to confer naturalization—not confer the right of naturalization, but to make per se, by force of the treaty itself, a Chinese subject a citizen of the United States.

There was another provision in the bill which the House of Representatives sent to the Senate. That was section 15, which reads:

That the words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining.

I believe I did not read the vote on the first proposition, the vote on the amendment to strike out section 14. I will read that. When you voted to strike it out that was a vote in favor of Chinese naturalization. Section 14 prohibited Chinese naturalization, and how did gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber vote who are now so anxious to close the door against the admission of Chinese in this country that they can not even allow a bill upon that subject to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations? How did the vote stand on that? In favor of striking down the provision which prohibited the United States courts from naturalizing Chinese, there were 28 Republicans for striking it out in the Senate, and among them was Mr. Harrison, 1 Democrat, and 1 Independent. The nays were 31 Democrats and 5 Republicans, the same five I have been reading about all the time, except it seems that my friend from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was not present or did not vote. The Republicans who voted "nay" were—Mr. Cameron, of Wisconsin, Mr. Chilcott, of Colorado, Mr. Hill, of Colorado, Mr. JONES, of Nevada, and Mr. Miller, of California. They were the only Republicans in the Senate who would put on record their votes against this inherent and inalienable right, as they had declared in 1868, of a Chinaman becoming an American citizen—just five of the Republicans.

Now I come to the other proposition, section 15. Here was a very restrictive clause, a very restrictive provision of the statute. It defined what Chinese laborers were, and in order to prevent any dispute in the courts as to what a Chinese laborer was, section 15 was introduced, and now let us see the definition:

That the words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining.

If that section had stood in the bill as it passed the Democratic House of Representatives, no skilled laborer as well as no unskilled laborer and no Chinaman engaged in mining could come. Now let us see how the vote stood on that. The motion was to strike out section 15 and the vote to strike it out was therefore a vote against the proposition contained in that section. In favor of striking out were: Democrats 1 and Republicans 31—thirty-one times as many Republicans here who wanted this section to go out of the bill as there were Democrats. Here was a chance for your haste, for your eagerness to close the door which you had opened, and yet 31 of you said "We will not close it" on that amendment. Let us see who the 31 were. I will read them all—a very respectable crowd; no names there except of great respectability. The list is as follows:

Among the yeas was Mr. Harrison, of Indiana. Now I will come to the nays, those who wanted to keep in the fifteenth section, and let us see how the vote stood on that. There were 29 Democrats in favor of keeping that section in, only lacking 2 of being as many Democrats in favor of keeping it in as there were Republicans in favor of striking it out. Thirty-one Republicans voted to strike it out, and 29 Democrats voted to keep it in and 1 Democrat to strike it out. The nays were as follows:

Let us see how many Republicans at that important point in this controversy marched up and said, as Senators on that side of the floor say, "We are going to close the door." How many of them were there? Just three, Cameron, of Wisconsin, JONES, of Nevada, and Miller, of California. And yet we hear all the time here about Democrats in the House not doing their duty in reference to this matter, and about a Democratic Administration not making a proper treaty and all that sort of thing, as if the Republicans (after having made this door by which this flood of Mongolians was poured on the innocent, hard-working, and industrious laborers of this country) are now alone in favor of closing it, that the Democrats, the Democratic House of Representatives, and the Democratic Administration, are not to be trusted with performing this work!

That was a vote in Committee of the Whole. There was another vote when the bill got into the Senate on striking out the section, and that turned out a little better. When it got into the Senate the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] said he would reserve a separate vote on section 15. When the Senate came to vote, against striking it out were found 1 Democrat and 31 Republicans, Harrison, of Indiana, voting then as he did in Committee of the Whole, and there were 34 Democrats paired and voting the other way.

That bill happened to meet with a little accident, a very common accident, too, it seems for Chinese restriction bills in American legislation. It encountered an executive veto, and another bill had to be introduced limiting the restriction to ten years. On that there were 22 Democrats voting for the bill in the affirmative and 9 Republicans, and the nays were 1 Democrat and 24 Republicans, nearly three times as many Republicans voting against the bill as there were voting for it. And yet now, with that record which I have read, the Republicans claim to be par excellence the friends of the American laborer, par excellence the men who in sunshine and in storm, against all opposition, propose to close the door which they themselves had made in 1868 and had written upon it: "To shut this door is to violate the inherent and inalienable right of a Chinaman to become an American citizen."

All things change, Mr. President. A change came over the spirit of the dream of our friends on the other side, and the reason for that change was announced upon the other side of the Chamber to-day; though not stated as a reason, it has been stated by one Senator or more upon that side; it is that all the country now wants these men excluded; unanimously the American people have determined to exclude the Chinese, and therefore, when the American people have become unanimous, against the votes, against the speeches, against the protests, against the teachings of the Republican side, they all fall in and say, "Why, this is our job; you Democrats who have brought about this change, who, when it was unpopular, when it was met by vetoes of Republican Presidents, in sunshine and storm, stood up for the rights of American laborers not to be crushed down by the Mongolian, we at last have become lukewarm—oh, no; worse than that, not only lukewarm in our day of prosperity and power and success, but we have become inefficient; a Democratic House can not pass a bill that is stringent enough;" and presto! change! the very men who opposed restriction from the beginning of this thing, from 1879 down to the passage of the last bill, until it had been developed that the American people were about unanimous on this question, these men who opposed it up to that time now step to the front, seize the colors, advance on the enemy, and say, "This is our flag and our fight, and you are laggards if not deserters!" That is the way to work it.

That is the history of this thing up to now, for the last time. These very moderate bills incurred two Republican Presidential vetoes, and one was passed by Democrats, and when a Democratic President, Mr. Cleveland, was in the executive office it was approved. That is the way that stands; and now we find our Republican friends, having through all this long series of years fought under this banner, not only for Chinese immigration to take the bread out of the mouth of the American laborer, but also having fought for what they called in grandiloquent language in the treaty of 1868 the inherent and inalienable right of a Chinaman to come here and to be a citizen and to vote. Now, after all this we can not go fast enough for them about it. We, who have borne the heat and burden of the day, when we march to get toward the setting sun, covered with dust and wearied with this strife to exclude the Chinese, are met by these eleventh-hour men who, not content, as the eleventh-hour men in the scripture were content, to receive the same pay with those who had worked all day long, come in and say, "We take all the pay and those who worked all day long shall not have any." That is the attitude of the Senators upon the other side, some of them, most of them. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], in my eye, and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], in my eye, are not of that sort. They fought under our banner. They set in early in the morning, and from the rising of the sun until the victory was won they fought by the side of these Democrats, deserted, and not only deserted, but knifed and opposed by the large majority of their associates. That is the way that thing worked.

Now, what is this? A Democratic House sends in a bill to-day excluding Chinese laborers. I suggested that perhaps it would violate a treaty. The ablest Senator not only on that side but on any side of this Chamber, and not only that but the ablest statesman now living in America, gets up and makes a remarkable proposition, he having all along voted with the majority of his party, hastened up now by this unanimous opinion coming up from the Pacific coast. He gets up here and makes the remarkable statement that the bill is in violation of a treaty, and if the House of Representatives had not passed the bill and therefore given him a right to assume that they had notice that the recent treaty was rejected, he would not vote for it!

That is a remarkable proposition, Mr. President. When, where, what provision not only of the Constitution, but what provision of nature allows the House of Representatives, 325 of them, to have information which can not reach the Senate? I have heard all along from my boyhood up, if you give a secret to two men it is no longer a secret. Yet the Senator from Ohio bases his action in voting for this bill upon the impossible hypothesis that 325 men in the House of Representatives had a secret, a secret about public matters, too, and under no obligation to keep it secret, and upon that passed a bill, and that secret had never reached the Senate. Therefore the Senator from Ohio, in acting in accordance with the House, was to assume that they knew something which did not exist!

If I understood the present occupant of the chair [Mr. DOLPH] correctly—I do not know that I did—I understood him to say, when he spoke, that there was no evidence that the treaty had been rejected. I am not sure that I understood him correctly, but that is the way I understood him, that nobody has any such information.

That was the mere skill of the practiced debater in framing an excuse for doing what he wanted to do. Nobody here believes that the House has any such information. Nobody believes that three hundred and twenty-five men in the House have a little piece of diplomatic history that has traveled 15,000 miles, from China to the House of Representatives, and when it got there it lost its wings, it lost its legs, and it could not travel any farther on to this end of the Capitol. That is the way the Senator from Ohio justifies his vote.

Now, I come to another point. Senators were pressed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] by the question if the bill was not a violation of the existing treaty. If I understood the Senator from Ohio aright he admitted at first that it was, until the matter was further pressed. The Senator from South Carolina was a little indiscreet I thought. I thought I heard him let out the object of his inquiry. He asked if it was a violation of a treaty with China, and every one of the Republican Senators would march right up to it and violate it, then what becomes of the excuse they have been making ever since the nomination at Chicago for their candidate's vote. When we pointed out the votes of the Republican candidate for the Presidency as I have read them to the Senate, the excuse has been, "why, he was an American Senator; he was intrusted by the Constitution and laws of his country with the honor of his country; and the honor of his country had been pledged in a treaty, and he could not violate it." That is the excuse which has been made; and so when that was let out Senators invented a new word for the same thing. It was not a violation of a treaty; oh, no, because if we acknowledge that we violate a treaty, we acknowledge that there was no excuse for General Harrison's vote. So they invented a new word.

Mr. President, men who play a game of this sort are very astute in philology. They have names, and they call the same thing by a variety of names, hoping that the American people are so blind, are so foolish that they can not look beyond the label which they put upon a thing at the thing itself. So we have now not "violation," but "abrogation." There is a little difference, but the difference is all in favor of the fellow who only violates it. A man might say, "I will violate the treaty a little; I am pressed. Here is a great public necessity crowding me, pressing me to a violation; I will apologize for that; I will make reparation for it." But the man who comes to abrogate destroys the whole thing.

Mr. TELLER rose.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not want to be interrupted.

Mr. TELLER. I should not think you would.

Mr. GEORGE. Whilst the one is taking a little homeopathic dose of violation the other swallows a whole drug store of abrogation. So they will go out before the American people, before the laborers of this country whose bread, whose respectability has been imperiled by the introduction of Chinese, hoping that these same laborers, toiling for support for themselves and their families, wearied when they go to their slumbers at night, will not have the opportunity to think of the difference between violation and abrogation.

This great Republican party dealt with this great question in the way I have detailed, resisting, holding up not only the plighted faith and honor of the American people as a barrier to all action in this matter, but pleading the higher law, even pleading the rights of the Chinese given to them by the beneficent Father of us all, making them inherent and inalienable. The Republican party having acted in that way and having made these pleas for this resistance now, after all that, come and charge those of us who have been in from the beginning with being laggards not to be trusted, and seek to screen themselves in a change of attitude by hocus-pocus and philological enigma. It is murder. Oh, it is everything; it is a stabbing of the Constitution; it is the destruction of the honor, the interest, and dignity of the American people to violate a treaty, but it is all right if you will just take a knife and instead of cutting off a little portion of the finger cut the treaty's throat; that is all right.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer than I expected upon this matter, and I have said about all I desire to say on it now. If the debate shall be continued, I may say something more hereafter.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate at any length, because I desire to have a vote on the bill this evening.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me just a second? I want to state to him that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] was obliged to leave the Chamber while the Senator from Mississippi was speaking. He said to me that he desired to address the Senate upon this bill, and he asked me to prefer the request that the bill should lie over until to-morrow and be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then let me say a few words now in reply to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VEST. It is now half past 5, and if it would suit the convenience of the Senator from Oregon he can take the floor, and we can have the bill printed and the debate can go on in the morning. I am as anxious to vote for the bill as he is, but it is hardly possible to get a vote this evening. We have not a quorum, and the yeas and nays will be called on the passage of the bill. If it will suit the convenience of Senators on the other side, we can let the bill be printed and go over until to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL. I prefer to say what I intend to say right now. The Senator from Mississippi declined to yield on a statement made by myself that in my judgment he had misrepresented the facts. I desire to correct that Senator in his statement of facts, and it was a statement, by the way, upon which he based the hour's speech that he has just concluded. He started out with the premise that when the Burlingame treaty was entered into there were no Chinamen in this country. On surprise being expressed by the Senator from Colorado at that statement, he modified it, as I remember, by saying that there were at least but very few here then, and then he proceeded to state that it was by virtue of the provisions of the Burlingame treaty that the door was opened for Chinese immigration to this country, and he attempted to charge the responsibility of that legislation upon the Republican party.

Now, Mr. President, I hold in my hand the statistics showing the exact number of Chinese who had come into this country prior to the existence of the Burlingame treaty at the one port of San Francisco alone. I have not only the total number, which was 141,800, but I have here the number in the year 1850, eighteen years before the Burlingame treaty was made, and I have also here the number who came each and every year between 1850 and the time when the Burlingame treaty went into effect.

There were in this country 10,000 Chinese prior to the year 1852 who had come in at the port of San Francisco alone, to say nothing of the thousand, perhaps, who had come in at other ports. In the year 1852 there came in at that port alone 20,026; in 1853, 4,270 came; in 1854, 16,084 came; in 1855, 3,329; in 1856, 4,807; in 1857, 5,924; 1858, 5,427; 1859, 3,175; 1860, 7,341; 1861, 8,430; 1862, 8,175; 1863, 6,432; 1864, 2,682; 1865, 3,095; 1866, 2,242; 1867, 4,290; 1868, before the treaty, 11,081; 1869, before the treaty went into effect, 14,990; making a total of 141,800 Chinese who had entered the limits of the United States at the one port of San Francisco alone before the Burlingame treaty was made. So the basis for all the talk here to-day made by the Senator from Mississippi to the effect that the Republican party opened the door to the immigration of Chinese to this country falls to the ground.

The very reverse of the charge made by the Senator from Mississippi in reference to the party and the men who invited Chinese immigration to this country is true. I can tell the Senator who it was in San Francisco and in the State of California who first gave countenance in most emphatic, direct, and influential terms to the immigration of Chinese to this country. In 1849 Peter H. Burnett was governor of the State of California. He resigned and one John McDougal, a Southern Democrat, succeeded, he being lieutenant-governor, to the position of governor in that State; and in 1851 or 1852 that same Democratic governor and representative from the South, a native of the South and a representative of Southern feeling and of Southern interests in the State of California, delivered a message to the Legislature of that State in which he referred to the Chinese as the "most desirable of our adopted citizens." He was the first man in the United States of America who ever referred to Chinese immigrants as being the most desirable of our adopted citizens, or as being desirable at all as citizens. He was a Democrat, the head of the Democratic party in California, representing Southern interests and Southern sentiment, and was the governor of the State of California.

That great Democrat (and he was a great man in his way, great in intellect, I believe afterwards a member of this body), according to the sentiments expressed in his message, preferred the Chinese to the thousands of worthy Irish and German, and Scandinavians and Norwegians and English, and to all other of our adopted citizens, by stating in a State paper that they, the Chinese, were the "most desirable of our adopted citizens." That sentiment, that expression, that movement, if you please, upon the part of the Democratic governor of the State of California in 1851, or perhaps it was 1852, had its fruit in the Legislature succeeding, which was a Democratic Legislature by the way.

Archibald Peachy, I believe, another Southern man, another Democrat, a leading member of the Assembly of the State of California at that time, a leader of his party, introduced a bill into the Democratic Assembly providing for the affirmation or legalizing in the United States of contracts for labor made in foreign countries. The object of that bill was to make valid in the State of California and in the United States of America contracts made with the Chinese for cooly labor ranging from two to three and five years, by which coolies were to be brought to this country to work in competition with the laborers of California for wages at from $8 to $12 a month, and that at a time when the ordinary common laborer in the city of San Francisco and in the State of California could receive $3 a day for his labor, or $90 a month. That bill passed the Democratic Assembly of the State of California.

Mr. STEWART. Every Democrat voted for it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Every Democrat in that House, as suggested by the Senator from Nevada, voted for it.

Mr. STEWART. And every Whig voted against it.

Mr. MITCHELL. And every Whig voted against it. The bill went to the Senate and there, thank God, it was defeated by who? By one Republican Whig and one Democrat—old Philip Roach, I believe.

Mr. STEWART. No; Roach was for it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am mistaken, then, about that. I supposed Mr. Roach had given his influence against it, but I am corrected in that. Then the man who led the opposition to the bill was David C. Broderick.

Mr. STEWART. He was the man who defeated it.

Mr. MITCHELL. And a leading Whig whose name I do not remember now, representing the city of San Francisco in the State Legislature.

Mr. STEWART. Dingly was the Whig.

Mr. MITCHELL. When the Senator from Mississippi therefore gets up here in his defiant way and charges the Republican party of this country and the Republicans of this country with opening the door to Chinese immigration to this country and inviting Chinese immigration to this country, he simply proclaims to the world his own ignorance of what he is talking about, or else he is not as careful as he should be in refraining from knowingly misrepresenting the facts. The door to Chinese immigration was opened by the Democratic party of California in the manner I have stated; and that is all I desire to say in reference to the matter, as I am anxious for a vote on the final passage of the pending bill.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to make a motion to adjourn?

Mr. TELLER. I will, retaining the floor.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the Chair submits the motion he will suggest that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has requested that the bill be printed.

Mr. VEST. Yes, let that order be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 186) to amend section 1225 of the Revised Statutes concerning details of officers of the Army and Navy to educational institutions, and so forth, with amendments in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 14) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to certify lands to the State of Kansas for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, September 4, 1888, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, September 3, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. J. H. CUTHBERT, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for immediate consideration.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] asks unanimous consent to introduce a bill for present consideration. It will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A supplement to an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved the 6th day of May, 1882.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any Chinese laborer who shall at any time heretofore have been or may now or hereafter be a resident within the United States, and who shall have departed or shall depart therefrom, and shall not have returned before the passage of this act, to return to or remain in the United States.

SEC. 2. That no certificates of identity provided for in the fourth or fifth sections of the act to which this is a supplement shall hereafter be issued; and every certificate heretofore issued in pursuance thereof is hereby declared void and of no effect; and the Chinese laborer claiming admission by virtue thereof shall not be permitted to enter the United States.

SEC. 3. That all the duties prescribed, liabilities, penalties, and forfeitures imposed, and the powers conferred, by the second, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth sections of the act to which this is a supplement are hereby extended and made applicable to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. That all such part or parts of the act to which this is a supplement as are inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The bill (H. R. 11336) was read a first and second time.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I should like——

Mr. SCOTT. I have not surrendered the floor.

Mr. JACKSON. I do not wish to object. I merely wish to inquire what is the purpose of this legislation. We have recently passed a general act on this subject.

Mr. SCOTT. If the House will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I will endeavor to explain the object of this bill and what is expected to be accomplished by it. It will be necessary to refer in this connection to the treaty of 1880 between the United States and China and the treaty which has lately been negotiated but not yet ratified. This bill does not conflict in any way with any treaty stipulations now existing between the United States and China. It merely proposes under certain conditions to prohibit Chinese laborers from coming into the United States. If the treaty recently negotiated has been rejected by the Chinese Government, then this bill is essential, and is the only possible way by which Chinese laborers can be kept out of the United States.

Mr. JACKSON. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] whether this bill has been submitted to the members on this side from the State of California?

Mr. SCOTT. No, sir; it has not been. It is now submitted to them.

Mr. PAYSON. Then it is offered for present consideration. I now see the gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] in his place.

Mr. MORROW. I should like to have a moment to examine the provisions of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania states that he has not yet yielded the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to call attention to what this bill proposes to do. Under sections 4 and 5 of the statute of 1882, enacted in conformity with the treaty of 1880, it was provided that a Chinaman then a resident of the United States might, under certain conditions, leave the United States, go to China and return, but was to do so under a certificate issued by the authority of our Government certifying his identity and that he was a resident of the United States. Under this authority, which our treaty stipulations under the treaty of 1880 did not require us to give, a Chinaman could take his certificate and return to China; and as the truth is a merchantable commodity from a Chinese point of view, those certificates were in many instances sold to Chinamen who had never been in this country, who took them and came to the United States in violation of the law. When a Chinaman reached the port of San Francisco the duty of the collector of the port under the law was to determine his identity; and when the collector by positive evidence knew that the Chinaman offering the certificate was not the person to whom it had been originally issued, the collector at once required such Chinaman to leave the country. But it was just here that the United States courts came in and upon habeas corpus proceedings declared in many instances that the Chinaman offering the certificate was the original owner. By this process Chinese laborers by the thousands have been permitted to come to the United States fraudulently under certificates which had never been issued to them.

If, sir, the report in regard to the rejection of the treaty by China is a correct one, or whether China ratifies the treaty hereafter or not, there is nothing inconsistent in this law or in what is proposed to be done under it in violation of the treaties.

Mr. McKENNA. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. McKENNA. I wish to get information from the gentleman in explanation of his bill. Does the bill you have submitted prohibit the coming of Chinamen to this country who have never been here?

Mr. SCOTT. No, sir. The treaty stipulations in regard to that——

Mr. McKENNA. I would like the gentleman to give me his opinion of the matter.

Mr. SCOTT. It is the existing law we are trying to repeal in connection with that subject.

Mr. McKENNA. But I would like to hear an explanation from the gentleman of the exact effect of the bill in that regard. My attention was diverted at the time the bill was read.

Mr. SCOTT. The bill had better be read again, and the gentleman can draw his own conclusions.

Mr. McKENNA. Can not you answer as to that yourself?

Mr. SCOTT. No; but I will ask that the bill be again read, and the gentleman can draw his own conclusions from the bill.

Mr. MORROW. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me, I understand from the gentleman's explanation that the bill is directed particularly to the revocation of the certificates of identification heretofore granted to the Chinese.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORROW. Let me say that in California we are unanimously in favor of any measure which will accomplish that result. We also desire to go further and prevent all further Chinese immigration.

Mr. WEAVER. So also in Iowa.

Mr. MORROW. And if the gentleman will allow this matter to go over until later in the afternoon, so that this bill can be closely examined to see that it accomplishes all that is necessary and desirable on the Pacific coast, or whether it needs amendment, there will be no opposition whatever to it. I can assure the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the delegation from the Pacific coast will co-operate with him in framing any additional provisions that may be necessary to relieve the coast of the evils involved in Chinese immigration.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The bill is short; let it be read again and the gentleman can see what it provides.

Mr. McCLAMMY. And he can put his own construction on it.

Mr. MORROW. You provide as I understand it for the repeal of the provisions of the act of 1882, which requires certificates of identification. That is not sufficient.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORROW. One of the difficulties and chief causes of complaint in California is not now in regard to these certificates of identification. The treaty of November 17, 1880, provided that any Chinaman in the United States at that time should have the right to come and go of his own free will and accord. Now, if there had been a bill upon the statute-books at that date, providing for the identification of such persons as were then within the limits of the United States and those who should thereafter depart, the evils we now complain of would not have occurred; but it was not until the 6th day of May, 1882, that a law was placed on the statute-books providing for the identification of those who should thereafter depart.

But between the date of the treaty of November 17, 1880, and the enactment of the law of May 6, 1882, some twelve thousand Chinamen departed without certificates of identification. Under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States any person who so departed was entitled to the privilege of returning on furnishing mere parole testimony that he was here when the treaty went into effect. Now, under that decision they are coming into San Francisco and other parts of the country upon producing mere parole testimony that they were here at the date of the treaty of 1880. The gentleman will see that if the bill does not guard against the evils we are encountering in this respect, it ought to be amended so as to provide to meet that difficulty. It should provide against the admission of those people who are coming here on the claim that they were here at the time of the treaty of 1880. What we want, therefore, is to provide, to-day if you please, by a bill in proper form, effectively against the coming of all Chinamen who left the United States prior to the 6th day of May, 1882, and declare positively that they shall not be entitled to return. That would remove the objection I am now making and remedy the difficulties under which we are now laboring.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, if the statement made by the gentleman from California is correct as to the phraseology of this bill the reading of it will show the House whether it meets the point or not. If it does not meet the point it can readily be amended, but I think it does. The amendment which he proposes or suggests would be right and proper if it is not already embodied in the bill; but I do not see, sir, why the amendment could not be with great propriety put upon the bill now as well as by the introduction of a separate bill this afternoon. And therefore, if the gentleman has such an amendment to offer in the line in which he speaks, I am very sure that this side of the House will readily acquiesce in accepting it. But for the information of the House I ask that the bill be again reported, reserving the right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be again read.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. McMILLIN. That covers the whole ground.

Mr. HATCH. Very fully.

Mr. SCOTT. I think the gentleman will observe that the first section clearly provides for the difficulties about which he has been speaking, and as the bill is complete in that respect, I move the previous question upon its engrossment and third reading.

Mr. MORROW. The reason that I made the suggestion I did about an amendment was because my attention was distracted when the first section of the bill was being read, and I did not really know until I heard the second and third sections read what the bill was about. I find now that it covers the point I made and I favor the bill.

Mr. BLAND. There has been great complaint about Chinese coming across the border from the British possessions. I would like to ask whether any provision is made as to that?

Mr. SCOTT. This covers the whole field.

Mr. MORROW. This does not protect us against immigration from the British possessions.

Mr. McSHANE. Oh, yes.

Mr. SCOTT. It does very fully.

Mr. DUNN. The bill seems to be very carefully drawn to cover the whole ground.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAIRD. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

EDWIN J. GODFREY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 9363, entitled "An act granting a pension to Edwin J. Godfrey."

The beneficiary named in this bill enlisted on the 27th day of May, 1861, in a New Hampshire regiment, and less than three months thereafter was discharged on a surgeon's certificate of his disability occasioned by "disease of heart existing prior to enlistment."

In 1881, twenty years after discharge, the beneficiary applied to the Pension Bureau for a pension, and alleged that his disease of the heart was the result of fatigue and overheating at Bull Run, Va., July 21, 1861.

If the heart disease of which the discharged soldier complained in 1861, and which the claimant of a pension in 1881 alleged still continued, could have been caused by fatigue and overheating in the only battle of his brief service, it seems to me that its manifestations and symptoms a month afterwards could not have been mistaken for such as belonged to a much longer continuance of the disease.

I am fully satisfied that the surgeon was not mistaken who made the certificate upon which the beneficiary was discharged, and that his military service is not properly chargeable with any disability he may have incurred.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, September 1, 1888.

JOHN S. BRYANT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 5155, entitled "An act granting a pension to John S. Bryant."

The man for whom this pension is proposed never, so far as I can learn, did a single day's actual military service at the front, nor ever left, in such service, the State in which he was enlisted.

He enlisted December 7, 1863, in a Maine regiment; on the 16th day of the same month he is marked as a deserter, having failed to report after leave of absence; December 31, 1863, he is reported sick in hospital at Augusta, Me.; January 26, 1864, he is marked as having deserted from Camp Keyes, at Augusta, Me.

He was discharged January 14, 1865, for disability occasioned, as the surgeon's certificate declares, "by a fall from a wagon while at home on a furlough, December 22, 1863." The certificate continues as follows:

"Never has done a day's duty—is utterly worthless and unfit for the Veteran Reserve Corps."

After his discharge the second charge of desertion was removed, and the first charge does not seem to be serious.

But he was injured while home on a furlough, his regiment still being in camp within the State of his residence; and although there are cases in which it seems not improper that pensions should be granted for injuries sustained during furlough and before actual return to duty, this does not appear to me to be one of them.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, September 1, 1888.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STEELE, from Wednesday next, indefinitely, on account of important business.

D. W. BOUTWELL.

Mr. RYAN. I ask that the bill (H. R. 2253) for the relief of D. W. Boutwell be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for. This being Monday, the regular order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions for reference.

COTTON BAGGING, ETC.

Mr. WHEELER introduced a bill (H. R. 11337) placing cotton bagging and other materials suitable for baling cotton on the free-list; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS COOSA RIVER.

Mr. FORNEY introduced a bill (H. R. 11338) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Coosa River at Gadsden, in the State of Alabama.

Mr. BLAND. Let the bill be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri (interrupting the reading). I ask that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

TRUSTS.

Mr. NEWTON introduced a bill (H. R. 11339) for the punishment of persons connected with trusts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

NEW LIBRARY BUILDING.

Mr. KELLEY submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the special committee engaged in investigating the construction of the new Library building be directed to inquire and report whether any member of the House, acting by or for himself or in concert or combination with others, has sought by persuasion, intimidation, or other corrupt or improper means to influence or control the action of Mr. J. L. Smithmeyer, architect of said building, in the selection, acceptance, or approval of inferior and improper material to be used in the construction of said building.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. KELLEY. The special committee investigating——

The SPEAKER. This resolution can only be offered now for reference. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that in the opinion of the Chair this is a privileged resolution and can be offered at any other time for immediate consideration; but if offered now it will go to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. KELLEY. Then I withdraw it for the present.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURTS AT SOUTH BEND, IND.

Mr. SHIVELY introduced a bill (H. R. 11340) providing for the holding of United States circuit courts at South Bend, Ind.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CHIEF AND ASSISTANT CHIEF BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. FORAN introduced a bill (H. R. 11341) to define the qualifications of the chief and assistant chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT POINT ISABEL, TEXAS.

Mr. CRAIN introduced a bill (H. R. 11342) providing for the reestablishment of the light-house at Point Isabel, Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

TRUSTS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 11343) defining trusts to be an unlawful conspiracy, and to provide for the punishment of persons connected with them and carrying them on, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRISP. I ask to suspend the rules——

The SPEAKER. There are two motions to suspend the rules now pending.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the regular order.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 14) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to certify lands to the State of Kansas for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, or issue scrip in lieu thereof.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. One of the pending motions to suspend the rules, as I understand it, is the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] in regard to the Oklahoma bill. Is the other the unfinished business from the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the situation of the business of the House in that respect. Some time ago, the Chair thinks on the third Monday in July, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], from the Committee on Military Affairs, moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill in relation to the celebration at Gettysburgh, and upon the question of ordering a second no quorum voted. Nothing further was done on that day. On next suspension day that matter would have been pending, but the gentleman from Illinois did not call it up. The Chair supposed it was abandoned and recognized the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], who made a motion to suspend the rules to fix a day for the Oklahoma bill, and upon further demand for a second no quorum appeared, and that went over. On the next suspension day the Chair recognized the gentleman from Missouri to complete consideration of the pending motion. Thereupon the gentleman from Illinois rose and stated that he desired to withdraw his former motion and substitute another bill for it; and that being committee day it was recognized by the Chair, who stated to the gentleman from Missouri that it had preference, and thereupon the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] temporarily withdrew his motion and a second was ordered on that motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, but no quorum voted. That is the situation of the business now.

Mr. SPRINGER. Was a second ordered?

The SPEAKER. A second was ordered on the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PAYSON. The pending motion, then, with reference to the bill presented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] is to fix a day for the consideration of the bill?

The SPEAKER. But that motion is not now before the House, because the gentleman yielded.

Mr. PAYSON. But that is the scope of the motion.

DETAILS OF ARMY AND NAVY OFFICERS TO EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

The SPEAKER. Yes, when it is reached. The question now is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to suspend the rules and pass the bill the title of which will be read.

A MEMBER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is not in the House at this moment.

Mr. HOOKER. I call up the motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion is pending and a second has been ordered upon it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent to have the bill read again.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be again read. The Chair understands that as the motion was made it applies to a Senate bill with House amendments incorporated in it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The bill which was under consideration the other day and upon which the vote was being taken is a Senate bill with amendments which had been previously adopted in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands, and he will cause the bill to be read with the amendments incorporated in it.

The bill was again read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to suspend the rules and pass this bill.

Mr. BLAND. Is debate in order on that motion?

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted, and the demand for the yeas and nays has been refused.

Mr. KILGORE. Was not a second demanded on the motion?

The SPEAKER. It was, and granted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. A second was granted, and the bill was debated, and now we come to a direct vote upon suspending the rules and passing it.

Mr. KILGORE. That requires a two-thirds vote, I understand.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It requires a two-thirds vote, and I hope it will receive it.

Mr. CROUSE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CROUSE. I was not present when this bill was discussed the other day, and I wish to inquire whether there will not be an opportunity now to move to amend it?

The SPEAKER. There will not.

Several Members. Regular order.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND; and there were—ayes 82, noes 18.

Mr. BLAND. No quorum.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays were refused by the House when this matter was last under consideration.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is it in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused?

The SPEAKER. It is not. Under the rules that motion must be made either on the same day or the succeeding day. The point of no quorum being made, the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 110, noes 5.

Mr. BLAND. No quorum.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do not do that. We shall have a quorum presently.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. What is the use of having this matter obstruct us all day, as it did before? It is not of sufficient importance to justify that. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken on ordering a call of the House; and there were—ayes 48, noes 28.

So the call was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following members answered to their names:

For the remaining absentees no excuses were offered except in the following case:

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I have a communication from my colleague [Mr. MOORE] stating that he is quite unwell to-day. I ask that he be excused.

There being no objection, Mr. MOORE was excused.

The SPEAKER. On this call 178 members, being more than a quorum, have responded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will please resume their places.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER (having put the question on the motion to adjourn). The noes seem to have it.

Mr. BLAND. Division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 29, noes 61.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places. Other business having intervened, the vote will have to be taken over again. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill which has been read at the desk.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 6.

The SPEAKER announced the result of the vote.

Mr. BLAND. No quorum.

Mr. FORNEY. I call up for further consideration the conference report of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. How can that come up now?

The SPEAKER. It is a matter of the highest privilege.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] will wait a few moments I think a quorum will appear.

Mr. FORNEY. This is one of the regular appropriation bills, and I want to have it considered now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] insists on his proposition.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Can the question of consideration be raised against this conference report?

The SPEAKER. It can. The Chair thinks the House has always the power to determine whether it will or will not consider any matter.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] raises the question of consideration against the report of the committee of conference on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a point of order. As the question was being taken by tellers on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], and as the point was made that no quorum had voted, is it in order to proceed to other business while the tellers are still on the floor and the point of no quorum has not been withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. But the Chair announced the result. That vote was completed. Although no quorum voted, the House took no further proceedings. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] then rose and called up the conference report. The Chair will state that the last entry on the official record of the House shows the presence of a quorum. A quorum simply did not vote on the last proposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to state it. The question is: Will the House proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the sundry civil appropriation bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. This being a day upon which it is in order to move to suspend the rules at any time after the call of States and Territories, does not a motion to suspend the rules suspend that rule which allows a conference report the privilege of being called up at any time? And is not the motion to suspend the rules before the House until disposed of?

The SPEAKER. But the rules have not been suspended.

Mr. SPRINGER. But this is a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. It is in order at this time to make a motion to suspend the rules, just as it is in order at any time to move to adjourn; yet, pending a motion to adjourn, any gentleman could under the rules call up a conference report.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the gentleman from Alabama can not stop the House from taking such action as it pleases. He can not stop the House from adjourning or enforcing its own orders.

The SPEAKER. If the House does not adjourn it stops itself from adjourning. [Laughter.] It is always within the power of the House to determine whether or not it will proceed to consider a matter. The question is, Will the House now proceed to consider this conference report?

Mr. CANNON. It is evident that nothing will be done by way of a suspension of the rules to-day, and I hope the House will go on with the consideration of the conference report and let us dispose of it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] will be recognized as soon as this is disposed of to move to suspend the rules and call up the Oklahoma matter. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The first question is, Will the House proceed to consider the conference report?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is well understood that we do not want to go into the consideration of this conference report, because we want to take up the Oklahoma matter and other matters which can be called up to-day under the rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope all in favor of Oklahoma and of the relief of persons using cotton bagging will vote in the negative on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. FORNEY, the House divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 34.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I reserve the point of no quorum.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. If we go into the consideration of the conference report does it not make it impossible to take up the proposition to give relief to the consumers of cotton bagging to-day?

The SPEAKER. If the House proceeds to the consideration of this report and consumes the entire day, of course no other business will be transacted.

Mr. CANNON. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk is calling the roll.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I wish to submit another question.

Mr. CANNON. Regular order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If this conference report is taken up it will prevent me from calling up the convict-labor bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. And it will stop the consideration of the Oklahoma bill and the cotton-bagging bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I wish to know the effect of the vote——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that if the House proceeds to consider the conference report and it consumes the entire remainder of this day, of course no other business can be transacted.

Mr. SPRINGER. It will consume the entire day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know if I have not the power to withdraw from consideration the bill detailing Army officers to colleges?

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the gentleman can withdraw the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Regular order.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I object to the withdrawal of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It does not affect this question in the least in any event.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] that the House proceed to consider the report of the conference committee on the sundry civil appropriation bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 82, nays 84, not voting 158; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.
The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is evident there is a determination to defeat this bill by reason of no quorum, and I therefore ask the consent of the House that the bill be laid aside for the present, in order that other measures may be taken up.
Mr. HOOPER. I object.
The tellers resumed their places.
Mr. BLAND. The right way is to defeat this bill.
Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask if there has to be a new vote?
The SPEAKER. Other business has intervened, and the vote will have to be taken anew.
The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 7.
Mr. BLAND. No quorum.
Mr. OUTHWAITE. As it seems impossible to get a quorum, I ask unanimous consent to take up the conference report on the sundry civil bill at this time.
Mr. MORGAN. I object.
Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I think it is very evident that we are not going to do anything to-day; and, therefore, I move that the House do now adjourn.
The question was put, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.
Mr. WEAVER. I call for a division.
Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I withdraw the motion to adjourn for the present.
The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and the tellers will resume their places.
After the count had proceeded for some time,
Mr. OUTHWAITE said: In order to give opportunity for the consideration of other business, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw this bill.
Mr. CHEADLE. I object.
Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.
Mr. CHEADLE. I will not withdraw the objection.
After further count the tellers announced—ayes 148, noes 16.
So (two-thirds voting in the affirmative) the bill was passed.

OKLAHOMA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair). There is an unfinished order, which is the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], which the Clerk will report. That will have to be disposed of and nothing can be taken up except matters that will take precedence of it, because there can not be two motions to suspend the rules pending at the same time.
Mr. DUNN. Can the gentleman from Missouri waive that temporarily in favor of another matter?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Only by unanimous consent.
Mr. KEAN. I call for the regular order.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded by the gentleman from New Jersey on the left [Mr. KEAN]. That is equivalent to an objection to laying it aside temporarily, and the Clerk will report the unfinished business.
Mr. WARNER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Could I by unanimous consent withdraw that temporarily?
Mr. CANNON. The gentleman can not get unanimous consent.
Mr. WARNER. I am asking the Chair as to my right.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can be laid aside temporarily with the right to be again taken up after other business only by unanimous consent, and the demand for the regular order operates as an objection.
Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, does that come up of itself, without any motion?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it does. The Chair was informed by the Speaker, who was occupying the chair when this matter was up before, that it was unfinished business, and that it would come up as such.
Mr. BLOUNT. But oftentimes unfinished business does not come up because no motion is made to take it up.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the regular order is demanded, and the regular order on this day is that motion, which comes over as unfinished business.
Mr. PAYSON. When the Chair says "that motion" he refers to the motion made on a prior day by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] to set a day for the consideration of the Oklahoma bill.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the motion to which the Chair refers.
Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, the motion that I made upon the last suspension day not having been seconded, I desire now to modify it by offering the bill which I send to the desk and moving to suspend the rules and put it upon its passage.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be read.
Mr. HOOKER. I reserve the right to object.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report first the unfinished business, after which the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri to make such motion as may be in order.
Mr. WARNER. I was about to state, in order to save the time which would be consumed in reading the entire bill, that the measure which I have sent to the desk is the bill (H. R. 10614) for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma, with such amendments as have been agreed to in Committee of the Whole and some other amendments which I can explain in a moment.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] is entitled to the floor in charge of his motion to suspend the rules made on a former day, and is recognized to control it.
Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. SPRINGER. The Speaker of the House, when this matter was up before, two weeks ago, held that the proposition, not having been seconded, the mover had the right to modify it so as to meet the requirements of the situation. It was moved four weeks ago to-day as an individual suspension, fixing a day two or three days thereafter for the consideration of this bill. When the next suspension day was reached the day named in the first resolution had passed, and the Speaker held that the gentleman from Missouri could modify his motion, which he did at that time, so as to fix a different day; which was a different motion entirely. Before this matter came up I consulted with the Speaker as to the right of the gentleman from Missouri to modify his motion, and the Speaker stated that the gentleman had a right to do so, no second having been ordered.
Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker——
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that the original proposition of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] was not, as the Chair is informed, a proposition to pass a bill to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, but was a proposition to fix a day for the consideration of a bill for that purpose. Now, if the Chair understands the gentleman from Missouri correctly, he makes a proposition not to fix a day, but to organize the Territory, which is an entirely different proposition.
Mr. SPRINGER. The Chair holds, then, that he could not recognize the gentleman to move anything that would be in order as an independent proposition?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Missouri were to withdraw his proposition, the Chair thinks he would have the right to do that, but at the same time if another gentleman had sought and obtained the floor for a different purpose and obtained it after the withdrawal of the gentleman from Missouri and the Chair recognized the right of the gentleman to proceed with the order which took precedence, he might lose his right.
Mr. SPRINGER. The order passed two weeks ago would be utterly inoperative and worthless, because it fixed a day which has already passed.
Mr. PHELAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry in that connection.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. PHELAN. Is it necessary therefore for the gentleman from Missouri to have unanimous consent for the purpose of moving the original resolution?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it would not require unanimous consent for the purpose indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee.
Mr. CANNON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. CANNON. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] on the Democratic side has just had a resolution voted upon. Now, as recognitions go, a recognition is due on this side, and why not let the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] modify his proposition and offer it as an original proposition?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will decide the question of recognitions as they rise after there is a right to recognize; not before.
Mr. WARNER. I wish simply to make this statement. Four weeks ago to-day I was recognized to propose a resolution fixing a day for the consideration of the bill for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes. That came over as unfinished business to the last suspension day.

The days named in the resolution I first offered had passed, and upon asking the Speaker of the House whether the resolution was within my control for modification, the ruling of the Chair, according to my very clear remembrance, was that the resolution not having been seconded, it was within my power to modify it in such way as I saw proper, so long as the modification related to the same general subject-matter and was germane to the original resolution. [At this point the Speaker resumed the chair.] Now I seek to so modify the resolution that instead of fixing a day in the future upon which a vote shall be taken on the bill organizing the Territory of Oklahoma, this day shall be fixed and the bill shall be put on its passage. This modification relates to the same subject-matter as the resolution, but instead of fixing a day in the future when the vote shall be taken the substitute I now offer proposes to fix to-day as the time for action on the bill. I submit that this seems to be within the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the proposition as now stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] is an entirely different one in principle from that which was involved in the resolution of two weeks ago. The proposition then, as I now recollect, was to set a future day for the consideration of the bill providing for opening the Territory of Oklahoma. If such a time were fixed, the bill under the rules would be subject to the ordinary methods of consideration; it would open to amendment and full discussion and all that sort of thing. I need not go over details which the Speaker and members of the House understand as well as I do. But the pending proposal of the gentleman is not to set a day for the full consideration of an important bill, but to pass now under a suspension of the rules, with fifteen minutes' debate on each side, a certain bill which he presents with certain amendments which he and his colleagues on the committee have appended to it. Now, speaking for myself, I have some half dozen amendments which I propose to offer to that bill when it shall be considered in regular order. I know of other gentlemen here who are in a like situation. It strikes me that the gentleman from Missouri presents now a proposition very different in principle from that which was embraced in the scope of the resolution which comes up as unfinished business under the demand for the regular order.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, the proposition which the gentleman from Missouri made on the 6th of August was a different proposition from that which he now submits. It is printed in the RECORD of August 7, and I send it to the desk to be read in order to show, first, that it is entirely different, and second, that as a matter of unfinished business it can not come over at all for the simple reason that the time then proposed to be fixed for the consideration of the bill and of certain pending amendments which were to be offered was embodied in the resolution and has now passed. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution, to be found in the proceedings of August 6.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the House proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10614) to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes; that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill; that the amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole be agreed to; and that other amendments not exceeding three in number and one amendment in the nature of a substitute may be offered to the bill, after which the vote shall be taken on such amendments, and then on the engrossment and third reading of the bill and the final passage thereof, without debate or other intervening motion or business.

Mr. HOOKER. Upon the reading of that resolution the following proceedings, as exhibited in the RECORD, occurred:

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?
Mr. BARNES, Mr. HOOKER, and others demanded a second.
Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.
Mr. BARNES. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, in writing, was delivered to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

PROPOSED TERRITORY OF OKLAHOMA.

The SPEAKER. A second is demanded, and the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. WARNER, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. BARNES.
Mr. PAYSON. I would like to have the resolution again reported.
The resolution was again read.
Mr. PAYSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. PAYSON. How would this resolution, if adopted, affect a pending amendment which was introduced and undisposed of at the time the bill was last under consideration?
Mr. SPRINGER. Not at all. It will have no effect upon it.
Mr. PAYSON. When this bill was being last considered an amendment of mine had been read and was pending. I had the floor at the time the House adjourned.
Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is on the floor for a parliamentary inquiry.
Mr. PAYSON. I wish to know how this would affect that amendment; whether it would be excluded,
Mr. SPRINGER. It was not disposed of at that time. It was pending and would be covered by the resolution.
The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, on examining the resolution, that if it should be adopted it would necessitate the offering of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois again—

Alluding again to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON]:

Mr. NELSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.
Mr. PAYSON. It is evident that the Speaker does not agree, then, with the gentleman from Illinois.
The SPEAKER. The resolution provides that amendments already agreed to in Committee of the Whole shall be adopted by the House, with the right of offering certain other amendments specified in the resolution.
Mr. PAYSON. Then I hope the resolution will be voted down.
Mr. SPRINGER. And one of the amendments referred to there is the identical amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois himself, if the gentleman will take my word. It does not preclude other amendments, but makes provision for a certain number which may be offered.
Mr. PAYSON. Of course I am perfectly willing to take the gentleman's word, but I wanted a ruling from the Chair as to the effect of the adoption of the resolution on the pending amendments.
The SPEAKER. If the resolution in its present form is adopted, it would preclude other amendments except those specified in the resolution itself.
Mr. SPRINGER. But it would not preclude action on the gentleman's amendment.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state, the resolution provides that amendments heretofore adopted in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall be agreed to by the House, so that this resolution disposes of those amendments; but it provides further that three additional amendments may be offered, as well as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, is this in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] is discussing a question of order.

Mr. HOOKER. I am discussing a question of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman will get through before next week, I hope.

Mr. HOOKER. I propose to go along in my own way. I do not want any advice from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. The RECORD is very good reading.

Mr. HOOKER. I use it for my purposes. The gentleman can use it for his, if he chooses, when he has the floor.

Mr. NELSON. It provides that three, but only three, amendments may be offered.
The SPEAKER. That is the effect of the resolution; and also a substitute.
The tellers will take their places.
Mr. HOOKER. I rose, Mr. Speaker, a moment ago to a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. HOOKER. I wanted to address the Chair this inquiry: I understand that under the rules of the House governing the business for this day it is set apart for a suspension of the rules and the passage of measures, bills, resolutions, or otherwise, which are pending before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union or other committees, and the motion is to discharge such committee from the consideration of the matter and put it upon its passage, the action thereon requiring a two-thirds vote. In the present instance the resolution refers to a measure which is pending before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and has been under consideration for several days in committee, to which various amendments have been offered; and my inquiry is whether it is within the power of a single member of this House on this day, which is fixed for the suspension of the rules, to defeat the consideration of that measure and others that may be pending by proposing a vote upon the bill——

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the modification which the gentleman now proposes to offer, and which he can not offer, as I understand, except by unanimous consent, is an entirely different proposition. It is not a proposition to fix a day for the consideration of this bill and the three amendments which it is admitted were pending and the substitute of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES], which was pending. The gentleman from Missouri now proposes to modify his proposition so as to pass the bill itself. The day named in the original resolution having passed, this proposition, even as an unfinished matter, has no longer any status in the House. It was a proposition to fix a particular day of a certain week now passed; and I insist that according to parliamentary practice and the rules of the House it can not be called up now for consideration; and a fortiori it can not be modified by the substitution of another separate and independent proposition, which proposes, outside of these amendments, to pass the bill itself as it is sent to the desk by the gentleman from Missouri.

I say, therefore, that as unfinished business it can not come up now, because that business was interrupted by the reading of a message from the President of the United States, on motion of my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]; and the question was propounded to the Speaker at that time whether or not that would interrupt this business, to which the Speaker promptly responded that it would, that it displaced it for the time being; and nothing further was done in regard to it.

Now, sir, various amendments have been adopted to the bill, which amendments have been adopted upon the agreement that there should be a vote upon them in the House; and if the gentleman may pass this bill now under a suspension of the rules without regard to the agreement made by the House in reference to the amendments, it defeats every vote on the amendments. But I insist, for the reasons I have already offered, that this is not a measure which can be amended, or that it is such a measure as may claim consideration as unfinished business, or which can be called up now, for the reason that the time fixed has passed by.

The SPEAKER. The question as to the right of a member to change or modify a motion or proposition submitted by him before the House has acted upon it in any way, has frequently arisen, and frequently been decided. The present occupant of the chair has always held that when a member has submitted a motion or proposition to the House, whether in the form of an original motion or as an amendment to a pending motion, it is his right to modify or change it at any time before it is voted upon, or before the previous question has been ordered, or before the adoption of any other action on the part of the House, which places the matter beyond the control of the member and within the control of the House.

In the present instance it is not, as the gentleman from Mississippi argues, a question of amendment. It is a question merely as to the form of which the gentleman from Missouri will submit the proposition, the House not having acted upon it in any manner whatever. It is quite true as stated, both by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] and the gentleman from Mississippi, that the proposition is a different one from that submitted by the gentleman some time ago. But it relates to the same subject-matter. The proposition was to fix a day for the consideration of this bill; and this proposition is—that time having passed by—to vote upon the bill now. It is still, however, in the power of the House to determine whether it will or will not second that proposition, so that the matter is entirely and absolutely within the control of the House, and not within the control of the Chair.

If the gentleman from Missouri sees proper to modify his proposition, or take the risk of having the House second and pass it, of course the Chair has no control over the matter.

Suppose, for instance, the time fixed in the original resolution for the consideration of the bill had now lapsed, and the gentleman should so modify his motion as to fix to-morrow for its consideration. The Chair thinks it would be admissible, and the Chair can not see any difference in principle between that and a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill now.

Mr. HOOKER. Except, if the Chair will permit me, that this would exclude consideration of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. Of course; but that is for the House. The House may not desire to consider them, and if the House does not desire to pass the bill it will not second the motion the gentleman makes, or will not pass the bill if it is seconded. It is always within the power of the House to control its own action.

Mr. PAYSON. Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to ask this question: Whether the present occupant of the chair was aware of the proposition made by the gentleman from Missouri while the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] was acting as Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear it.

Mr. PAYSON. Would it make any difference in the position taken by the Chair if it appeared that the gentleman from Missouri, in charge of the bill, now offers, instead of a bill to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, as was originally proposed, a bill to organize a portion of the territory embraced in the former bill, to wit: the neutral strip, and without regard to the balance of the Indian Territory, except as lands shall be acquired piecemeal hereafter?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would make no difference if the Chair is correct in the basis of this decision; the whole matter being a modification of the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, which is submitted to the House itself for its action. But as to the merits of the proposition, or whether or not it is practically the same as the other proposition, the Chair thinks does not affect the question of order, because the House has as yet passed upon nothing. The whole subject is before it for its action.

Mr. WARNER. I move to suspend the rules——

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that to be the pending motion.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CANNON. Regular order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. This is in the regular order. I wish to ask, if the motion of the gentleman from Missouri has not been seconded by the House is it not still in his power to withdraw it?

The SPEAKER. It is; the Chair has so decided.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That was decided to the contrary in the absence of the present occupant of the chair. The gentleman sought to withdraw the motion and objection was made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman who was temporarily occupying the chair decided that the gentleman could withdraw the motion, but that he could not withdraw this motion and submit a new one unless he was recognized by the Chair for that purpose.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is true. I was just going to state, Mr. Speaker, in order that my friend from Arkansas may not misrepresent my position unintentionally, for I know he would not do so intentionally, that the then occupant of the chair thought the gentleman from Missouri might withdraw his proposition, but to do so to offer another he could not get an agreement from the then occupant of the chair that he would be recognized for that purpose after yielding the floor to another; that the question of recognition would be then with the Chair, as it is at all times in all other cases, and that the Chair could not consent to couple with the request of the gentleman to withdraw the proposition an agreement to recognize him to submit another motion.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. PAYSON. Has the proposition as modified been read?

Mr. HOOKER. It has not been read.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Am I correct in interpreting the Chair as holding that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] can withdraw his proposition at this time, and that when the proposition that would come up immediately after this concession is passed he would be again recognized?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has made no such decision.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. What would be his right to have consideration of the matter immediately after the consideration of the question to which he would yield by withdrawing?

The SPEAKER. That is a purely abstract question. He has not offered to withdraw it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. If the Chair will pardon me, it is a question based upon what I understand just occurred when the present occupant of the chair was absent. The gentleman did offer to withdraw it.

Mr. WARNER. I did offer to withdraw as the gentleman states, but as I understood the then occupant of the chair ruled that it took unanimous consent to withdraw, and if that be the case I do not offer to withdraw.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think the gentleman will find that his proposition to the Chair carried with it a condition-precedent to yielding that he should withdraw it temporarily for a motion by another gentleman, and that he should then be recognized after that matter should be disposed of. As the then occupant of the chair I stated, as I would on all occasions, that I would recognize when the time came, but I would give no information as to what I would do in advance. I think the gentleman will find that was the ruling.

The SPEAKER. Regular order is demanded.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I wish to inquire further. I do not fully understand the position of the gentleman from Tennessee, and I think it is a perfectly proper inquiry for the gentleman from Missouri to know just how far he parts with his parliamentary rights before he consents to take a given step in connection with the resolution. And I inquire whether or not the gentleman from Missouri would have the right to be recognized after consideration of the proposition that he proposes temporarily to withdraw in favor of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Missouri to withdraw.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. But the gentleman has proposed to withdraw, and that is the question that has been under consideration, and that is what the gentleman will propose again if he can now understand that he does not permanently surrender his rights.

The SPEAKER. By consent of the gentleman from Missouri the motion now before the House might be withdrawn temporarily until some other motion was made and disposed of, just as on the last day for the suspension of the rules the gentleman did yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

Mr. WARNER rose.

Mr. CANNON. That takes unanimous consent, and I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I make a motion, then, that the proposition offered by the gentleman from Missouri be temporarily withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. That motion can not be made. The Clerk will read the resolution.

Mr. RYAN. Let us have the regular order.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10614) to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That all that part of the United States included within the following limits, except such portions thereof as are hereinafter expressly exempted from the operations of this act, to wit: Bounded on the west by the State of Texas and the Territory of New Mexico; on the north by the State of Colorado and the State of Kansas; on the east by the reservation occupied by the Cherokee tribe of Indians east of the ninety-sixth meridian of west longitude, and by the Creek, Seminole, and Chickasaw reservations; and on the south by the Creek, Seminole, and Chickasaw reservations, and by the State of Texas, comprising what is known as the Public Land Strip, and all that part of the Indian Territory not actually occupied by the five civilized tribes, is created into a temporary government by the name of the Territory of Oklahoma: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to impair the rights of person or property, or to impair any patent to or right of occupancy of lands now pertaining to the Indians in said Territory under the laws and treaties of the United States, Executive order, or otherwise, or to include any territory occupied by any Indian tribe for which title has been conveyed by patent or otherwise from the United States, or to which such tribe may be entitled by law, Executive order, right of occupancy, or treaty, without the consent of said tribe, or any territory which by treaty or agreement with any Indian tribe is not, without the consent of said tribe, to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory; but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries and constitute no part of the Territory of Oklahoma until said tribe shall signify its assent to the President of the United States to be included in the said Territory of Oklahoma, except for judicial purposes as provided herein, or to affect the authority of the Government of the United States to make any regulation or enact any law respecting such Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, which it would have been competent to make or enact if this act had never passed.

SEC. 2. That there shall be a governor, secretary, Legislative Assembly, supreme court, attorney, and marshal for said Territory, who shall be appointed and selected under the provisions of Title XXIII, chapter 1, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the government of all the Territories. The provisions of said title shall have the same force and effect in the Territory of Oklahoma as in the other Territories of the United States: Provided, That all such officers appointed and selected for said Territory after the said Territory has been organized for a period of five years shall be appointed and selected from the bona fide residents thereof: Provided, That the Legislative Assembly and Delegate to the House of Representatives shall not be elected until the President shall order: Provided further, That no person shall be entitled to vote at the first election or to be elected to any office who has not been a bona fide resident of said Territory for sixty days previous to said election: And provided further, That the council in said Territory shall consist of thirteen members, and the house of representatives shall consist of twenty-six members, which may be increased to thirty-nine.

SEC. 3. That the Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect in said Territory of Oklahoma as elsewhere in the United States: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with the local governments of any of the Indian tribes which may now be provided for by the laws and treaties of the United States, or which may exist in conformity thereto: And provided further, That the supreme court of the Territory shall have jurisdiction and shall embrace all causes of action, crimes, and offenses arising within the limits of the Territory organized by this act; and all laws heretofore passed granting jurisdiction to United States courts within the limits of said Territory are hereby repealed; but cases now pending shall be prosecuted to their final disposition therein the same as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 4. That the section of country lying between the States of Kansas, Colorado, and Texas, known as the Public Land Strip, is hereby declared to be a part of the public domain of the United States, and shall be open to settlement under the operation of the homestead laws only, but the provisions of section 2301 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to any entry of any of the lands in said Territory except as otherwise provided in this act: Provided, That the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of land in each township shall be reserved for school purposes.

SEC. 5. That whenever the Creek and Seminole tribes of Indians shall signify their assent to the provisions of this section, in legal manner, to the commission provided for in this act, and the President has issued his proclamation fixing the time as provided herein, the unoccupied lands ceded to the United States by said tribes under the treaties of June 14, 1866, and March 21, 1866, shall be open to settlement, except the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in each township, which shall be reserved for school purposes, and shall be disposed of to actual settlers only, in quantities not to exceed 160 acres in square form to each settler, at the price of $1.25 per acre. All persons who are heads of families or over twenty-one years of age, and who are citizens of the United States, or have declared their intention to become citizens thereof, shall be entitled to become actual settlers on such lands. An accurate account shall be kept by the Secretary of the Interior of the money received as proceeds of the sale of such lands. The commission hereinafter created by this act is hereby authorized to confer with the Creeks and Seminoles to ascertain whether said Indians are entitled to any further compensation than that heretofore paid for said unoccupied lands. If said commission shall find that further compensation should be paid said Indians, they may, by negotiation with said Indians, fix the amount of such additional compensation, not to exceed the sum of $1.25 per acre, less the cost of sale and the amounts heretofore paid said tribes in the purchase of said lands; and any additional sum agreed upon by said commission to be paid said tribes for said lands as provided herein, shall be placed to the credit of said tribes in the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 6. That whenever the Cherokee tribe of Indians shall signify their assent to the provisions of this section, in legal manner, to the commission provided for in this act, and the President has issued his proclamation fixing the time as herein provided, the unoccupied portion of the lands west of the ninety-sixth degree of west longitude as agreed to be, ceded according to the provisions of the treaty concluded July 19, 1866, shall be open to settlement, except the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of said land, which shall be reserved for school purposes, and shall be disposed of to actual settlers only, in quantities not to exceed 160 acres, in square form, to each settler, at the price of $1.25 per acre. All persons who are heads of families or over twenty-one years of age, and who are citizens of the United States, or have declared their intention to become citizens thereof, shall be entitled to become actual settlers on such lands. An accurate account shall be kept by the Secretary of the Interior of the money received as proceeds of the sale of said lands, and said money shall be placed to the credit of the Cherokee Indian tribe in the Treasury of the United States, after deducting the cost of the sale by the United States and the amount heretofore appropriated and paid to the Cherokee tribe as part compensation for said unoccupied lands: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any person to enter upon or occupy any of the lands mentioned in this or the preceding section, for the purpose of settlement or otherwise, until after the said Indian tribes and the commissioners herein authorized have concluded an agreement to that effect as provided herein, and laid the same before the President of the United States, who is thereupon authorized and required to issue his proclamation declaring such relinquished lands open to settlement, and fixing the time from and after which such lands may be taken. Any person who may enter upon any part of said lands contrary to the provisions of this act, and prior to the time fixed by the President's proclamation, shall not be permitted to make entry upon any lands or lay any claim thereto in said Territory. No land-warrant or land-scrip of any kind shall be located on any land embraced in this act.

SEC. 7. That the President may, at such times as he may deem it necessary, direct land offices to be opened in the Territory of Oklahoma, not to exceed four in number, and may nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint the usual officers to conduct the business of said land offices; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall, when directed by the President, cause the various portions of said lands to be properly surveyed and subdivided, where the same has not already been done. It is hereby made the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to carefully examine each claim taken under the provisions of this act before issuing a patent to the claimant; and if it shall appear that said claim was not taken in good faith, he shall refuse a patent and declare all prior proceedings before had in such case to be null and void; and all persons settling on lands under the provisions of this act shall be required to select the same in square form, as near as may be, and to maintain a continuous personal residence of three years on the land, and to improve and cultivate the same for that period in the manner required by the homestead laws before obtaining title thereto; but payments for lands, where payment is required to be made by this act, shall be made in four equal installments, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, as follows: The first payment shall be made within six months from the time of entry, the second at the expiration of one year from date of entry, the third at the expiration of two years from date of entry, and the final payment shall be made at the expiration of three years from the date of entry: Provided, That there shall be reserved public highways 4 rods wide around every section of land in said Territory, the section lines being the center of said highways; but no deduction shall be made in the amount to be paid for each quarter-section of land by reason of such reservation.

SEC. 8. That the procedure in applications, entries, contests, and adjudications under this act shall be in the form and manner prescribed under the homestead laws of the United States, and the general principles and provisions of the homestead laws, except as modified by the provisions of this act, shall be applicable to all entries made hereunder, and no patent shall be issued to any person who is not a citizen of the United States at the time he makes final proof and payment. Final proof and payment, except in cases of contest, shall be made within three months after the expiration of three years from the date of entry, and in default thereof, or in default of the payment of any installment of the purchase-money when due, the entry shall be liable to cancellation, and the money paid thereon shall be forfeited to the United States. Lands entered under the provision of this act shall be liable to taxation after the first installment of the purchase-money shall have been paid; but the same shall not be subject to any judgment or lien obtained upon indebtedness contracted or obligation incurred prior to the issue of patents therefor, nor shall such lands be sold, or contracted to be sold, leased, or contracted to be leased, conveyed, mortgaged, or in any manner encumbered prior to final proof or payment and the record thereof made in the office of the register and receiver of the district where the land is located; and any sale, lease, conveyance, or mortgage made, executed, or contracted for prior to such final proof, payment, and record shall be absolutely null and void; and all assignments, transfers, and mortgages of unpatented land entries shall be at the risk of the assignees, transferees, and mortgagees, who shall have no recourse against the United States for any failure of claimant's title before issue of patent: Provided, That the provisions of section 2305 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "Homesteads," shall apply to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That whenever any portion of the lands opened to settlement by the provisions of this act shall be occupied for town-site purposes, and the Secretary of the Interior is satisfied that they are occupied in good faith and are necessary for such purposes, the said Secretary is hereby authorized and directed to cause patents to be issued therefor, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to any legally organized company occupying and entitled to the same, upon the payment in cash of $20 per acre for the lands so occupied. The money so received for each town-site, except such amount as may be required to be paid to the Indian tribes, as provided in sections 5 and 6 of this act, shall be held by the Secretary of the Interior as a separate school fund for the benefit of the people of such town, and shall be expended under his direction for the erection of school buildings and the support of schools therein: Provided, That town-sites actually occupied on the Public Land Strip at the date of the approval of this act by not less than one hundred bona fide inhabitants shall be patented to the legally organized company selected by said inhabitants, said sites to embrace the amount of land provided by law: Provided further, That all patents issued for town-sites in the Territory of Oklahoma shall contain reservations for parks and other public purposes, embracing in the aggregate not less than 10 nor more than 20 acres; but no deduction shall be allowed on this account in the amount to be paid for said town-sites as provided in this section; and patents for such reservations shall be issued to the towns respectively when organized as municipalities.

SEC. 10. That all lands in the Territory of Oklahoma not embraced in the provisions of sections 4, 5, and 6 of this act, which are not required by law, treaty stipulations, executive orders, or right of occupancy for the use of any Indian tribe, or which may be relinquished as an Indian reservation, shall be open to settlement under the provisions of this act: Provided, That whenever Indian lands are purchased by the United States with the consent of the Indians, and opened to settlement in said Territory, the President of the United States may fix the price to be paid therefor by actual settlers, which price shall in no case exceed $1.25 per acre, and the proceeds shall be held for the benefit of the Indians concerned, as provided in sections 5 and 6 of this act.

SEC. 11. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a commission, to be composed of five persons, not more than three of whom shall be members of one political party, whose duty it shall be to open negotiations with the Creeks, Seminoles, and Cherokees, for the purpose of securing the consent of said Indians, so far as it may be necessary, to the provisions of section 5 and section 6 of this act. The commission is authorized to enter into such agreements with said Indian tribes as it may deem necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act, and shall submit the same to the President for his approval or rejection. The compensation of the members of said commission shall be at the rate of $10 per day; and they shall also be allowed, in addition thereto, their actual necessary traveling expenses, stationery, and postage. They shall have power to appoint a secretary, who shall receive a compensation of $6 per day, and such allowances for traveling expenses as he may actually incur. The President of the United States is hereby authorized to enter into agreements at any time with any of the tribes of Indians in the Territory of Oklahoma for dissolving their tribal relations, for holding lands in severalty, and for their ultimate citizenship, and to this end all the provisions of "The act to provide for the allotment of land in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes," approved February 8, 1887, shall extend to and be put in force in said Territory at the earliest time practicable.

SEC. 12. That it shall be unlawful for any person, for himself or any company, association, or corporation, to directly or indirectly procure any person to settle upon any lands opened to settlement by this act with a view to their afterward acquiring title to said lands from said occupants; and the parties to such fraudulent settlement shall severally be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished, upon indictment, by imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, or by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 13. That all leases of lands belonging to the United States or held in common by any of the Indian tribes within the Territory of Oklahoma, as organized by this act, including the Cherokee Strip west of the ninety-sixth degree of west longitude, whether controlled by persons, corporations, or others, except such leases as are held for the purpose of cultivating the soil strictly for farming purposes, are hereby declared void and contrary to public policy; and it is hereby made the duty of the President, within a reasonable time after the passage of this act, to cause the lessees of said lands, and any other persons illegally occupying the same, to be removed from said lands.

SEC. 14. That the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866, granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad and its extension to Red River, and an act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, approved July 27, 1866, and subsequent acts and joint resolutions, so far as said act or acts or joint resolutions apply to any lands included in the provisions of this act, and an act of Congress granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the southern branch of the Union Pacific Railway, and a telegraph from Fort Riley, Kans., to Fort Smith, Ark., approved July 26, 1866, or any other acts of Congress so far as they relate to lands granted in said Indian Territory and the Public Land Strip, except for the right of way and necessary stations as now provided for by law, are hereby repealed; and all or any rights to said lands are hereby forfeited to the United States, and no railroad company now organized, or hereafter to be organized, shall ever acquire any lands to aid in the construction of its road, or in consequence of any railroad already constructed, either from the United States or from any Indian tribe, or from any Territorial government within the limits of the Territory organized by this act.

SEC. 15. That neither the Legislative Assembly of said Territory, nor any county, township, town, or city therein, shall have power to create or contract any indebtedness for any work of public improvement, or in aid of any railroad constructed or to be constructed, nor to subscribe for or purchase any shares of stock in any railroad company or corporation.

SEC. 16. That the provisions of this act shall not be applicable to lands lying within the limits of what is known as Greer County, nor shall said county be subject to the jurisdiction of the Territory of Oklahoma, until the question of title thereto between the United States and the State of Texas shall have been finally determined in favor of the United States.

SEC. 17. That so much of the lands embraced in the Indian Territory as have not yet been surveyed shall be surveyed, and the incomplete surveys of the lands in the tract commonly known as the "Public Land Strip," or "No Man's Land," shall be completed, as soon as practicable after the passage of this act, according to the terms of existing laws for the survey of the public lands of the United States, and to enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry out the provisions of this section, at the rates now allowed by law for the survey of such lands, the sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; the surveys to be executed under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

SEC. 18. That the laws of the State of Colorado which are not locally inapplicable or inconsistent with this act are hereby enacted for and put in force in the Territory of Oklahoma, and the governor of said Territory is authorized to appoint all officers for said Territory where appointment or election is provided for under said laws until the Legislative Assembly of said Territory shall otherwise provide.

SEC. 19. That the Territorial government hereby established shall not extend to or exercise any jurisdiction over any part of said Territory of Oklahoma except as to what is known as the Public Land Strip, until the President shall issue his proclamation, as provided in section 6 of this act.

Mr. PAYSON. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A second has been demanded and tellers have been ordered.

Mr. PAYSON. I beg the Chair's pardon, it has not progressed so far.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks otherwise. Tellers have been ordered. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] will act as tellers.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the vote on ordering a second be waived, and that the motion be considered as seconded in order that this may be disposed of, so as to let another matter come up that is of great importance, the bill to abolish the trust in cotton bagging.

Mr. PAYSON. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I supposed the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] was a friend of the bill. I see now that he is willing to defeat it.

Mr. PAYSON. I hope my colleague will not embrace this opportunity to be over-smart. The gentleman from Illinois (myself) has a right to demand a quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will embrace this opportunity to say that the gentleman is doing all he can to defeat the bill.

Mr. PAYSON. To defeat the bill in its present form, yes. I hope there will be no misunderstanding about it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Or in any form.

Mr. PAYSON. I shall oppose any bill for opening up this great territory that does not include the homestead principle as well for the settler as for the soldier. Let that be distinctly understood.

Mr. SPRINGER. This bill preserves the homestead principle in every form, except that it does not allow commutations in any case, and that it requires the settler to pay $1.25 an acre for his land, the amount the Government must pay in order to acquire the Indian title. If the gentleman insists upon the provisions of his amendment, which was rejected by a vote of 114 nays to 49 yeas, he knows the House has already decided against his amendment, and therefore he is against this bill in any shape in which it can possibly be passed. That is, he is against it, unless he can put an amendment upon it which he knows will kill it.

Mr. WEAVER. I call for the regular order. I am glad the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has disclosed his hand.

The House divided; and, before the completion of the count, the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 70.

Mr. PAYSON. No quorum.

The vote by tellers was continued.

Mr. PAYSON. I am content to have the result announced now.

The tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 8.

Mr. CLEMENTS. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. No quorum has voted. Gentlemen who desire to vote will please come forward and do so.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I will yield to the gentleman for a minute.

Mr. PHELAN. I have a little bill which I desire to call up, and to which I do not believe there will be any objection——

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to yield for the introduction of any bills. I hope the House will not adjourn until we have had a vote upon the Oklahoma bill.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and there were—ayes 55, noes 49.

Mr. WARNER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 49, nays 101, not voting 174; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names of members voting be dispensed with.

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. MCCOMAS, until further notice.

Mr. BYNUM with Mr. STEELE, until further notice.

Mr. HUTTON with Mr. ATKINSON, for the rest of the day.

Mr. TAULBEE with Mr. BELDEN, for the rest of the day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I presume it does not make any difference that no quorum has voted on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. It does not. Less than a quorum may adjourn or refuse to adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then if a quorum appears on the vote now to be taken, that will cure the difficulty. I will inquire also whether this is a new vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the practice the vote will have to be taken again, as business has intervened. The question is on seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

The House again divided; and after the count had continued some time,

The SPEAKER said: On this question the tellers report—ayes 57, noes 4.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House adjourn, as within a few minutes we must adjourn at any rate.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, September 4, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 8636) for the relief of Isaac N. Enloe was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 11262) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Kentucky River and its tributaries by the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine and Beattyville Railroad Company was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced his signature of the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 14) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to certify lands to the State of Kansas for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

GALVESTON HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. COKE. On the 31st of August the Deep Water Convention which assembled at Denver, in the State of Colorado, adjourned after having passed the resolution which I send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The following preamble and resolution, by Governor Evans, of Colorado, were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas it is of vital importance to all the vast region between the Mississippi and the Pacific that a harbor deep enough to protect the fleet that will be required to handle the commerce of the whole region of country nearer to it than any Atlantic seaport be constructed on the northwest coast of the Gulf of Mexico as soon as practicable; and

"Whereas such harbor is of such great national importance that it is worthy of an ample appropriation from Congress for its construction; and

"Whereas we have already requested the present members of Congress to favor such an appropriation, but would make that request more emphatic: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the Legislatures and people of all the States and Territories included in the region described be earnestly requested hereafter to elect no Senators, Representatives, or Delegates to Congress except such as are known to be heartily in favor of such an appropriation and will earnestly and faithfully work for it until such a harbor is completed."

Governor Evans insisted that the deep-harbor issue must be made a sectional one, and be fought from the primaries up.

Mr. COKE. The States and Territories represented in this convention were Iowa, Missouri, Wyoming, Arizona, Texas, and Kansas. I have received from the deep-water committee of the city of Galveston a memorial addressed to the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives of the United States in favor of a deep-water harbor of the first class at Galveston, Tex., which it is desired shall be considered in connection with the resolutions of the convention just read. I ask unanimous consent that the memorial, which is a very valuable one as a statement of facts, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. DAWES. I should like, before the Senator from Texas takes his seat, to call his attention to the peculiar phraseology of the resolution. While it may be a very proper thing, as I doubt not it is, to petition Congress for such an appropriation, to distinctly announce that no man shall have the vote of anybody unless he shall do so and so when he gets into Congress is an unusual phraseology to say the least. I call the attention of the Senator to it.

Mr. COKE. That is the resolution verbatim of the Denver convention. I will suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the people have ways of their own and do things to suit themselves.

Mr. DAWES. But the propriety of sending such a public announcement to Congress and have it put upon the records here is a matter to which I call the attention of the Senator. It is very proper for the people to express their opinions and intentions about voting for men who entertain particular opinions. That is all well enough; but to announce in Congress upon what terms members of Congress can obtain the votes of the petitioners is an unusual phraseology.

Mr. COKE. The resolution, I will state to the Senator, was not sent to Congress by this convention. It was taken from a paper giving the proceedings of the convention. I presume if the convention had been addressing Congress it possibly might not have used that language, although I regard the language as being simply expressive of the very earnest desire of the convention on the subject. It simply emphasizes their wishes.

Mr. DAWES. I do not mean to say that there was any improper motive behind such phraseology, but it is precisely the phraseology that one would choose who did have improper motives; and therefore, if the convention did not send it to Congress and it is simply moved by the Senator from Texas, I do not regret that I have called his attention to the phraseology.

Mr. COKE. Nor do I regret, Mr. President, having presented the resolution. I think it is a very proper resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas that the memorial be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make one observation in regard to this matter. The memorial which has just been presented by the Senator from Texas affords one among ten thousand evidences of the close connection which binds the business interests of this country.

Some two or three years ago I was visited by the representative of a very important business firm in the city of Boston, having engaged in large trade with the State of Texas, who called my attention to this very improvement, and bespoke my interest in it, and spoke of it as being of great interest to an important commercial house in the city of Boston, which I, with my colleague, represent here.

It is a strong one among the many evidences of the great importance to all parts of this country, not merely to special localities or sections, of improvements in the great harbors and great rivers over which commerce among the States in this country and commerce with foreign nations in part is conducted. I may here refer to what Mr. Webster stated in a speech of his made to his constituents at home after he had voted for a large expenditure to remove either a rock or a shoal in the harbor of Mobile. He received a letter from an enthusiastic constituent reproaching him very severely for that vote in spending so large a sum of public money for a harbor so distant from his own home. Mr. Webster replied to him that however that might be, a very valuable vessel, with its cargo, belonging to a very near neighbor of the writer of the letter had been wrecked on that very shoal or rock in Mobile Bay a few weeks before.

I desire to assure the Senators from Texas that it will give the representatives of the commerce of Massachusetts the very greatest pleasure to support this desire of their own constituents when the time shall come.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the printing of the memorial in the RECORD? The Chair hears none.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial to the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives of the United States for a deep-water harbor of the first class at Galveston, Tex.

On behalf of six millions of people, sparsely occupying an area of 800,000 square miles, embracing the States of Texas, Kansas, and Colorado, the Indian Territory and the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, with parts of other States and Territories contiguous, equal in extent and fertility to other portions of the Union having a population of 35,000,000, annually producing for shipment as surplus products five hundred millions of values, we respectfully urge that, within your several spheres of constitutional power and obligation, you lend your earnest aid to the vigorous prosecution of the improvement of the entrance of Galveston Harbor as a port of the first class, and that the driblet system of uncertain and inadequate appropriations for this work be abandoned, and provision be made by the appropriation of the balance of its estimated cost for carrying the work to speedy completion without interruption.

There is no engineering difficulty or doubt as to practicability; the exercise of no doubtful political power is invoked; no complaint is made of the official channel through which the work is being prosecuted; no change of plans or increase of estimates is asked; but only that for the wasteful procrastination of uncertain and inadequate appropriations there be substituted by sound statesmanship and practical wisdom business methods, and a subject so intimately affecting the welfare of so large a part of your fellow-citizens be dealt with in the fair and liberal spirit its importance demands, and an appropriation be made in solido of the balance of the estimated cost to complete this work, and thus give to the producing interests of this portion of the Union access to the markets of the world by the shortest lines to deep-water transportation.

The Government, through the Bureau of Engineers, is now engaged in this work on plans for 30 feet of water across the bar, at a total estimated cost of $7,000,000, of which sum it has already expended $300,000, and $500,000 is appropriated by the present bill. The present plans and estimates were adopted in 1886, at which time Maj. O. H. Ernst was first assigned in charge of the work. Prior to that time, in some tentative engineering experiments, the Government had wasted on the work at Galveston, distributed over a period of thirteen years, $1,481,782.84. There was also expended by the Government engineer lately in charge, $100,000, subscribed by the city of Galveston. The city of Galveston itself expended, efficiently, under the supervision of its own officers, in the years 1873, 1874, and 1875, $170,000 in improving the inner navigation of the harbor. Nor have the citizens of Galveston meanwhile been unappreciative or the inadequate manner in which the deep-water problem was being dealt with at this port, or otherwise inactive in the matter. In 1883, in response to their invitation, a proposition was obtained from the late James B. Eads for 30 feet of water across Galveston bar at a cost of seven and three-quarter millions of dollars—"no water, no pay." In his letter of December 6, 1883, containing this proposition, Captain Eads says:

"A less channel than 30 feet should not be contemplated by your city, inasmuch as cheap freights require vessels of deep draught, and there is no reason why such works should not be constructed at Galveston as would place her harbor within the reach of the largest carriers now contemplated. * * * At least 20 feet could be relied on within two years after the work is begun, and about 2 or 3 feet each year thereafter until the 30 feet is obtained. The deepening would continue slowly under tidal action for several years thereafter, and I should expect it to reach at least 35 or possibly 40 feet before a permanent regimen would be established through the channel. * * * I have estimated the necessary works at Galveston to secure a permanent channel 30 feet deep at seven and three-quarter millions of dollars, for which sum I will construct the same, and will agree the payment therefor shall depend solely upon the increased depth obtained."

A committee appointed by the city council of the city of Galveston attended the sessions of the Forty-eighth Congress and urged the adoption of the Eads proposition. A favorable report was secured from the Committee on Commerce in the Senate, and the passage of the bill in that body reasonably assured. Before the Committee on River and Harbors of the House the subject was earnestly debated by General Newton, then Chief of the Bureau of Engineers, by Captain Eads, and by the members of the Galveston committee. The river and harbor bill had already been reported with the usual perfunctory provision of $250,000 for Galveston. On the motion of the member from Galveston district, by instructions, this appropriation was stricken out and the port of Galvestom omitted from the bill. On the reference of the Eads bill to the House committee, the opposition to it proved effective, and, in the last days of the session, a compromise was had, the committee reporting as an amendment to the general bill an appropriation of $1,000,000 for Galveston for the ensuing fiscal year, with provision for superintendence by Captain Eads. The river and harbor bill failed of passage, and Captain Eads's engagements did not permit of his subsequently renewing his proposition. The diagram of the territory natural to the port of Galveston, with accompanying statistics, prepared by the Galveston News during the pendency of the Eads bill, is referred to in this connection.

The revision of the plans and estimates by the board of 1886 places, it is believed, the views of the Bureau of Engineers and Captain Eads in substantial accord, both as to engineering plans and as to cost of the work.

Within the last six years the river and harbor bill has thrice failed to become a law, having been vetoed once by a Republican President, once by a Democratic President, and again failed of passage.

The Society of American Civil Engineers lately caused a careful examination to be made by the National Press Intelligence Company of New York of two thousand newspapers with a view of obtaining a reflex of public opinion on the general bill, with the following result: Twenty-two papers in favor of, and one hundred and twenty-nine papers against the bill. The relief required at Galveston should not depend on so uncertain a measure.

Pending the discussion of the Eads bill, by direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, an elaborate report was furnished by Mr. Nimmo, then Chief of the Bureau of Statistics (Senate Miscellaneous Document, Forty-eighth Congress, No. 111), on the importance of deep water at Galveston. That officer says:

"The harbor at Galveston, having a depth at its entrance at the present time of only 14 feet, is the best harbor on our entire Gulf coast from the mouth of the Mississippi to the Rio Grande. It is also believed to be the one most susceptible of such improvements as would constitute a harbor of the first class. Its superiority to the other ports of Texas is clearly indicated by the Coast Survey charts and by the fact that the principal railroads of this State extend to Galveston or connect with railroads terminating at that point. * * * The value of railroad properties in the State of Texas is about $160,000,000. This large expenditure of private capital in supplying means of internal transportation in Texas expresses faith in the resources of this State, and emphasizes the importance of securing for it a first-class seaport. Such expenditure stands also as the strongest indorsement of any practical plan for the accomplishment of that object. The proposed improvement of the entrance to the port of Galveston would constitute a connecting link between this great system of internal transportation and the ocean, nature's great free highway of commerce. If the proposed depth of 30 feet at the entrance to the port of Galveston can be secured, that port would become the nearest and most accessible first-class seaport for the States of Texas, Kansas, and Colorado, the Indian Territory, and the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, and parts of the States and Territories adjoining those just mentioned. * * *

"It may be remarked also in this connection that the central portions of the State of Kansas are about equidistant from Chicago and Galveston. * * * If the harbor of Galveston shall be so improved as to admit the entrance of vessels of the largest size, the various railroads connecting this city with Arkansas, Western Missouri, Western Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and New Mexico will become active competitors with the railroads extending east, not only with respect to trade with Europe, but also with respect to the trade between the area referred to and the chief Atlantic seaports. * * * This competition would assert itself not only in the transportation of the products of the interior by way of Galveston, but also, and perhaps to a greater extent and more beneficially, in the regulating influence which it would exert over the rates charged by all the east and west railroads extending from Chicago to the Atlantic seaboard. The magnitude of the advantages which would be thus afforded to the commercial and industrial interests of the country it is impossible accurately to compute or even approximately estimate, but the great importance of such advantages is clearly apparent. * * * In view * * * of the vast area of country the commercial and industrial interests of which would be directly subserved by the proposed improvement in the harbor of Galveston, and by the fact that such improvement would also, through competition, directly benefit a very large proportion of the whole country, it appears proper to characterize that project as a work of great national importance."

The report calls attention to a letter accompanying it from Capt. R. W. Meade, of the United States Navy, from which the following extract is given:

"When once over the bar the harbor of Galveston is commodious and well sheltered. The approach to the coast is easy and safe, and from an experience of eighteen months in command of a blockader in 1864 and 1865, I can say that it is, as to weather and approaches, one of the safests of coasts."

On the 21st day of December, 1887, a State immigration convention was held at Dallas, Tex., and was largely attended from all sections of the State. That convention adopted the following resolutions:

"Whereas the great State of Texas, with its varied and extraordinary resources, developed and in process of development and still undeveloped, with an ocean border of over 500 miles, is without a seaport of sufficient magnitude to properly accommodate the maritime commerce necessary to the work of sufficiently developing the grand stretch of States and Territories whose natural water way to the markets of the world is the Gulf of Mexico; and

"Whereas through this condition the agricultural and pastoral interests of the State have been retarded in a very large degree, and the matter of economic ocean transportation burdened at the expense of the producers of a section of country greater in extent than all the rest of the United States put together; and

"Whereas the cotton-growers of Texas have borne their share of the burdens which lack of a proper seaport has inflicted upon the people of the State, yet, greatest of all inflictions, through this condition has fallen upon the cotton interests of the State, and in an eminent degree likewise upon the grain-growers of Texas; and

"Whereas the efforts of the General Government, through the recommendations of the board of United States engineers, for many years past to give a deep-water seaport to Texas, have been defeated by the system of desultory action and scattering methods, resulting in waste of means and failing in the accomplishment of any substantial good: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention—called together for the purpose of devising ways and means to best make known the resources of the great State of Texas and to induce thereto honest labor and honest energy, and as a correlative branch of this convention—that the Texas delegation in Congress be urgently requested to unite their efforts in that body for securing deep water on the Texas coast at one point, that point to be by the best lights before them and according to their best judgment, but to unite in a common practical way to obtain the desirable end, heretofore defeated by desultory action and scattering methods.

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that the end herein sought will be best attained by concentrating upon one point, demonstrating the practicability of the methods employed, giving to the State a deep-water seaport, and paving the way for other seaports on the Texas coast as necessity and development warrant."

A committee, composed of Messrs. S. B. Maxey, D. C. Giddings, D. A. Nunn, J. P. Smith, Bryan T. Barry, W. D. Cleveland, John Hancock, B. H. Davis, W. L. Moody, and J. W. Throckmorton was appointed and charged with the presentation of the resolutions to the Texas Senators and members of the House. That duty the committee performed, visiting Washington for the purpose.

In Appendix T of the annual report of the Chief of Engineers for 1887, will be found the report of Maj. O. H. Ernst on the improvement and progress at Galveston. Attention is called to the following extracts therefrom:

"The sum asked" (for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889) "is $3,000,000. No very extended explanation of this recommendation seems to be required. A present annual trade of $73,000,000" (not including the coasting trade except by Mallory and Morgan steam-ship lines) "and a prospective trade of vastly greater proportions is hampered by an obstruction which it is in the power of Galveston to remove. The necessity of the improvement is notorious. The evil results of attempting its removal with inadequate means are almost equally notorious. It is submitted that the interests at stake require that the work should now be undertaken seriously." (See third page of cover for statistics accompanying report.)

On the 11th and 12th of July, 1888, a deep-water convention was held at Fort Worth, Tex., attended by some seven hundred delegates from every portion of the State, and also by delegates from various commercial bodies from the State of Colorado. Resolutions were adopted urging vigorous measures by Congress for obtaining a port of the first class on the Texas coast. Prior to the meeting of the Fort Worth convention, the secretary of the Fort Worth Board of Trade addressed the honorable Secretary of War, requesting that an officer of the Engineer Corps should be detailed to attend the convention for the purpose of imparting information. That request was referred to Major Ernst, in charge of all works on the Texas coast, except at Sabine Pass. That officer responded as follows:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Galveston, Tex., July 7, 1888.

SIR: I have to-day received your letter of the 18th ultimo, addressed to the Honorable Secretary of War, requesting him to permit an engineer officer of the War Department to attend the convention to be held at Fort Worth on the 10th instant, who is to bring with him charts and details bearing upon the subject of a deep-water port upon the Texas coast, and explain the same to the delegates. This letter has been referred to me, with the permission of the Secretary of War to attend the convention in my private capacity and not as a representative of the Government.

I regret to say that official business, made pressing by the recent close of the fiscal year, will prevent me from being present in person at the convention; also that charts suitable for explaining the situation of the various harbors to an assemblage of several hundred delegates would have to be specially prepared, and for that there is now neither time nor money available. The best that I can do under the circumstances is to present a few facts, which may be of service in aiding the convention to reach an opinion upon some of the questions to be brought before it. I shall confine myself mainly to the engineering features of the subject.

The coast-line of Texas from Sabine Pass to the Rio Grande measures about 375 statute miles. In this distance there are four points which are now receiving the attention of the Government with a view to harbor improvement, namely: Sabine Pass, at the eastern extremity of the line, Brazos Santiago, at the western extremity, Galveston, 65 miles from the eastern extremity, and Aransas Pass, 138 miles from the western extremity. Pass Cavallo and the mouth of the Brazos River have also been the subject of expenditure, but the present Congress has discontinued the work at those places.

The channel depth over the bar at date of last reports was at—

	Feet.
Sabine Pass	8
Galveston	12½
Brazos Santiago	5

All measured at mean low tide. Foreign vessels which now visit the Texas coast draw about 20 feet, and to accommodate them there should be not less than 20 feet depth of channel over the bar. It can be obtained by suitable improvements at Sabine, Galveston, and Aransas, but not at Brazos Santiago. For safe anchorage these vessels require about 24 feet in the harbor. The area of water 24 feet deep is at—

	Acres.
Sabine	100
Galveston	1,304
Aransas	60

The improvements designed to furnish 20 feet depth over the bar at these places have been begun. To complete them there remains to be appropriated after deducting the amounts provided in the river and harbor bill now before Congress, for—

Sabine	$2,379,000.00
Galveston	2,200,000.00
Aransas	1,471,000.00

Dividing these numbers by the number of acres of deep water, we find the cost per acre to reach the anchorage is, for—

Sabine	$23,790.00
Aransas	24,516.17

The depth of 20 feet over the bar, which is sufficient to answer the most immediate pressing needs of Texas, is not sufficient to admit many large commercial vessels and ships of war. To accommodate these an extension of the improvements at Galveston is contemplated, designed to give a depth of 30 feet at a cost of four millions additional to the amount mentioned above. No 30-foot channel over the bar has been projected at either of the other places. The area of water 30 feet deep is, at—

	Acres.
Sabine	63
Aransas	19

It is thus seen that the natural advantages which created Galveston and made her the principal port of the State still exist to maintain her pre-eminence. She has no rival. But while she is now the only port of any prominence, and must always be the principal one, it does not follow that secondary ports can not be made and are not needed. Aransas Pass, in particular, is 172 miles from Galveston, and its railway furnishes the shortest line to the coast for a large part of Western Texas. The improvement of that entrance is desirable for the purpose of creating a harbor of refuge in addition to providing a highway of commerce. The same is true, though perhaps in a less degree, of Sabine Pass. I believe that the best interests of Texas require the development of both Galveston and Aransas, and possibly of Sabine Pass. The latter locality not being in my district, is not so well known to me as the others.

Trusting that your meeting may be a harmonious one, and that it will result in benefit to the State of Texas,

I remain, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. H. ERNST, Major of Engineers.

Mr. THOS. J. HURLEY,
Secretary Board of Trade, Fort Worth, Tex.

The depth of water on Galveston bar by the last official report was 12½ feet. A later survey, just completed but not yet made public, will, it is believed, show 13½ or 14 feet.

Inside Galveston bar there are 1,304 acres of 24 feet depth; 463 acres of 30 feet depth, and a considerable acreage of 40 and 50 feet depth. It may be confidently stated that there is no fair question of the success of this work according to present plans and estimates. It is believed that it will be completed within a period of between two and three years, if the money is furnished to allow of the work going forward without interruption.

The phenomenal development of that portion of our country naturally tributary to the port of Galveston by its great increase in population, manifold industries, and interior lines of transportation render the necessity of deep water at Galveston most exigent, and constitute just cause for dealing with the improvement now in progress with exceptional vigor.

It is alike a power and a duty devolved upon the General Government, and is without the domain of State and municipal action or private enterprise. The amount of money required is not equal to 5 cents per bushel on the annual corn crop of Kansas, and scarcely exceeds a half cent per pound on the annual cotton crop of Texas, which will be saved to the producers by cheaper freights in a single year.

The necessity is obvious, the emergency great; we invoke a broad spirit of patriotism which shall make possible the right development of this great region of country.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to ask, though slightly out of order, in relation to the memorial from Texas just ordered to be printed, if it is the one that is upon the tables of Senators this morning?

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. I will inquire if the order to print embraces the picture and advertisement of the Galveston News?

Mr. COKE. That was taken out.

Mr. BLAIR. I should think that would be perhaps as useful in the way of an advertisement as any part of the memorial. Certainly Galveston is the center of the universe from its appearance on the map here presented. I have rarely seen anything in any of the mountain books of my own country that really would be such an advantage to a locality as this superb production of the Galveston News.

Perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts who took part in the conversation on this subject has had his attention called to the illustration in the memorial. As far as I am concerned, I should be glad to give my assent to the reproduction of the illustration as well as the memorial. I think it would suit his constituents; and probably something of the kind should be filed as an offset from the enterprising city of Boston, and New Hampshire would come in for a very favorable illustration, if there could be the precedent established. It is much better than the printed matter, and what is to be found on the back of the document, the editorials and the statistics of Galveston and that vicinity, are of very great importance. I do not notice anything in regard to the condition of illiteracy in that State, but it bears with great force and comprehensiveness and ability upon everything else, upon everything relating to the material development of that great Commonwealth.

I shall not make any request myself, but indicate the pleasure it would give me to have the illustration reproduced in the RECORD, as well as the memorial itself.

Mr. COKE. The copy of the memorial handed the Secretary to be incorporated in the RECORD did not contain the map which accompanied the memorial referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire. It would take too much space in the RECORD; but if it is necessary for the information or for the pleasure of the Senator from New Hampshire, I am perfectly willing that on his suggestion the map shall be published with the memorial.

Mr. BLAIR. I made the suggestion, but I have made so many other useful suggestions to the Senators from Texas which they have not accepted that I am discouraged.

Mr. CULLOM. I suggest that there is probably a rule which would prevent the map going in without a motion to print being referred to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Practically there is no question before the Senate, because the paper sent forward to the desk by the Senator from Texas does not contain the map or the advertisement.

Mr. COKE. It does not contain them.

Mr. BLAIR. I observe that the memorial is not signed by anybody.

Mr. PADDOCK. If the Senator from New Hampshire is through with his playfulness I should like to make a report.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not hear the Senator.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McPHERSON introduced a bill (S. 3509) granting a pension to Horatio M. Ellison; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 3510) to declare unlawful combinations in restraint of trade, production, and manufacture, and to punish persons and corporations concerned therein; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CULLOM. I believe that one or two bills on this subject have been referred to the Committee on Finance and perhaps another was sent to the Committee on the Judiciary. I am somewhat at a loss to know where the bill belongs, but I am inclined to think it ought to go to the Committee on Finance, as it is a matter touching the revenue laws somewhat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance, if there is no objection.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 3511) to increase the pension of John H. R. Storey; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 3512) granting a pension to Daniel Kendall; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

DETROIT RIVER AND ST. CLAIR FLATS.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate whether in the navigation of the Detroit River or the St. Clair Flats, at the mouth of the St. Clair River, the channels in ordinary use for commercial purposes are in waters under the jurisdiction of the United States or of the Dominion of Canada, and what difference exists, if any, in the depth of water available for purposes of navigation between the parts of said river or of said flats which are within the respective jurisdictions named.

DISTRICT ELECTRIC WIRE HEARING.

Mr. HARRIS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and it is hereby, authorized and empowered to employ a stenographer to report hearings before said committee on the subject of overhead electric wires in the cities of Washington and Georgetown, the expenses therefor to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

CAMPAIGN WORK BY A SENATE EMPLOYÉ.

Mr. FARWELL. Would it be in order for me to call up now for consideration the resolution which I reported yesterday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would not.

Mr. FARWELL. I will ask unanimous consent——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate as morning business a resolution coming over from yesterday submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. VEST was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service be instructed to inquire whether employés of the Senate, whilst receiving pay, and when the Senate has been in session, have been engaged in preparing partisan campaign literature for the purpose of advancing the interests of the Republican party in the pending canvass, and whether publication of the matter so prepared has been published by an employé of the Senate with his official character printed thereon, and what legislation is necessary to prevent and punish such conduct, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, one good turn it is said deserves another. The advertisement which the Senator from Missouri gave yesterday to a Republican publication I think ought to be fairly returned by an advertisement in favor of a Democratic publication. I hold in my hand a book entitled "Hand Books of the Tariff, No. 1. Tariff from the White House. Extracts from the Messages. Henry Talbott, clerk to Committee on Ways and Means"—meaning the clerk to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, and of course Democratic. The Senator will observe that this is only No. 1. I am told that No. 2, from the same hand and with the same title page, changed only to meet the change of the matter, is in press and will be out in a few days.

I do not care to have any part of these pages read, because I do not deem it necessary to do anything more than merely call attention to it. It is a complete parallel to the case mentioned in the resolution of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BLAIR. It is only a little one.

Mr. PLUMB. As the Senator from New Hampshire says, it is "only a little one" anyway. It is not as large as the one the Senator from Missouri called attention to; but I will ask the Senator from Missouri if he does not think on the whole he had better discipline his own side of the House before he arraigns any one on the Republican side?

Because of what the Senator from Missouri said on yesterday from the text of Mr. McKee's book about the severe and simple civil service of this Administration, as illustrated by the acts of the President in the case of two United States district attorneys, one Democratic and one Republican, I wish to call the attention of the Senate more particularly to the case of Mr. Benton. The Senator said in the opening of his remarks that he called on the President immediately after he had suspended Mr. Benton, and the President announced to him in very emphatic terms that he intended to treat everybody alike and to apply the same rule to Democrats that he did to Republicans.

I have in my hand the remarks which Mr. Benton made while occupying the office of district attorney, and which led to his removal, the reading of which begets in me somewhat conflicting emotions. I will read those remarks as reported in a St. Louis paper at the time. The speech was delivered October 11, 1885.

Mr. VEST. In what paper?

Mr. PLUMB. I am not sure whether it was the St. Louis Post-Dispatch or the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, but I have an extract from the Post-Dispatch before me, a Democratic paper, stating that the statement as published was true, and then I have the affidavits, beside, of some more people, including two or three members of the church and so on, who heard the speech delivered.

Mr. BLAIR. Were they Democrats?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know whether they were Democrats or not. I do not know really that it is necessary for a minister to be a Democrat in order to be able to tell the truth. Among other things Colonel Benton said:

It is the truth that the Democracy is the poor and ignorant party of the country—the great barefooted, unwashed, and dirty-socked party. * * * I don't agree with President Cleveland in everything. I don't believe in his civil-service humbuggery. I do believe in genuine civil-service reform, but I don't want men under me to work every conceivable dodge to defeat me and my party at the next election. But he believes it, and he is a man with iron nerves. * * * I don't agree with Mr. Cleveland on the silver question. He was raised east of the Alleghany Mountains, and he gets his ideas from that region. He never has been west of Buffalo, and has not any more idea of the great West and its vast material resources than the mere schoolboy who learns it from studying geography. He gets his ideas on finances from the gold-bugs of Wall street, who once demonetized silver and had it—the dollar—stricken from the coinage act clandestinely and without the consent of the people. He learns his financial theories from Wall street, the leeches that suck the blood of the honest yeomanry of the West like vampires. That is where Mr. Cleveland gets his ideas of finance.

When he wrote his gratuitous letter on the subject of silver coinage, even before he was inaugurated as President, he illustrated where he got his ideas, and he struck a blow at the West in the interest of the bondholders and money sharks, and I feel like sinking down in my boots; but when REAGAN, of Texas, and others stood up in their dignified manhood and wrote to him that he was the Executive and not the law-making power, and I saw these Democrats battling for their rights and the rights of the people against his assumptions, I rejoiced again that I was a Democrat.

Here it is marked in parentheses that there was "tremendous applause."

I do, in a great measure, indorse his administration. For the most part I indorse his vetoes of pension bills, but not every one. He vetoed ninety-seven pension bills, eighty-one of which had been rejected by Commissioner W. W. Dudley, whose name is odoriferous all over the country. I am not here to defend every one of his vetoes, but in the main I do.

I have here an article from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of December 9 following, in which the statement is made upon the authority of that newspaper that the speech as reported, from which I have read, was substantially correct, and there is given as authority Mr. W. T. Sullivan, who makes his statement under oath, which is supported by the testimony of Judge Frank Ewing, of the Daviess County probate court, a prominent Democrat, who, when approached on the subject of Mr. Benton's speech, reluctantly admitted that Sullivan's report was substantially correct, saying further:

I am afraid Benton made use of the language attributed to him. I am a strong Cleveland man myself, and I've got no use for any son of a gun who will draw a salary from the Government with one hand and rip it open with the other as Benton did.

I have here the following statement:

GALLATIN, Mo., December 14, 1886.

We have read the report of a speech made by United States district attorney for the western district of Missouri, Col. M. E. Benton, at Gallatin, Mo., October 11, 1886, and hereto attached, and having heard the speech delivered by Colonel Benton, we state that the report of the same is substantially correct.

That is the report which I have read, which was signed by William M. Bostaph, attorney at law and ex-county clerk; John A. Keck, attorney at law; Boyd Dudley, lawyer, as to civil service and Cleveland's knowledge of the West; Hadly Brown, ex-county treasurer; A. H. Blakley, farmer and ex-justice of the peace for twelve years.

A similar statement is made by Elder J. K. Reid, pastor of the Christian Church, and Oscar Saylor, attorney at law, and others, as follows:

The proof of the correctness of report of Benton's speech at Gallatin, the following-named Democrats would testify to its substantial correctness:
Elder J. K. Reid, pastor of the Christian Church.
Oscar Saylor, attorney at law.
Ed. E. Yates, chairman Democratic county central committee.
Frank Ewing, probate judge.
William D. Hamilton, prosecuting attorney.
Jesse McClure, attorney at law.
William L. Brosius, M. D.
D. Harfield Davis, druggist, late editor Gallatin Democrat.
Joshua F. Hicklin, attorney at law.
James F. Nealand, member of city council.
T. B. Yates, president Farmers' Exchange Bank.

I ask that the article from the Post-Dispatch, to which I have referred, may be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The article is as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, December 9, 1886.]

Senator GEORGE G. VEST and other friends of Col. M. E. Benton, United States attorney for the western district of Missouri, are very much exercised over the attorney's unfortunate penchant for doing and saying the wrong thing on important occasions. Within the past week Senator VEST has been called upon to put forth his utmost influence to save Benton from a second and final suspension from office. Charged first with neglecting his official duties to bolster up the Democratic party by making campaign speeches, Benton was reinstated on his own and Senator VEST's representations that he had attended strictly to the business of his office, and had always been a true and faithful servant of the Administration.

Last week President Cleveland was surprised by the published report of a speech said to have been made by Benton, at Gallatin, Mo., in which the policy of the Administration was severely criticised, and the President himself personally attacked for his attitude on the silver question and civil-service reform. The President is reported to have been very angry when he heard of Benton's abuse of the Government under which he served, and it was generally believed at Washington that the district attorney would be severely dealt with. Senator VEST again rushed to Benton's rescue, and advices from the capital this morning indicate that the President has again been convinced that the charges against Benton are untrue and that Benton is an ardent admirer and supporter of the Administration. A Post-Dispatch reporter, who visited Gallatin since the publication of Benton's speech, ascertained that the best of reasons exist for believing that the speech was delivered as reported by Mr. W. T. Sullivan and that it abounded in unpleasant reflections upon President Cleveland and his policy. Mr. Sullivan has made affidavit to his report which charges Benton with having referred to the President's "civil-service humbuggery" and gives Benton credit for having discovered that "Cleveland gets his financial ideas from the gold bugs of Wall street."

Mr. Sullivan's affidavit is supported by the testimony of Judge Frank Ewing, of the Daviess County probate court, a prominent Democrat of Gallatin, who when approached upon the subject of Benton's speech reluctantly admitted that Sullivan's report was substantially correct. "I am afraid Benton made use of the language attributed to him," said Judge Ewing. "I am a strong Cleveland man myself and I have got no use for any son of a gun who will draw a salary from the Government with one hand and rip it open with the other as Benton did. He said in effect that the President draws his inspiration on the silver question from the gold-bugs of Wall street, and referred to Cleveland's civil-service policy as 'humbuggery.' Benton's remarks were very ill-timed and injudicious. The Democrats of Daviess County brought him here to make a good, old-time, whoop-'em-up Democratic speech, hoping by advertising him as a nephew of old Tom Benton to draw out a number of old Democratic voters. He did not make the kind of speech we expected and threw a fire-brand in our midst by attacking President Cleveland."

"Then Mr. Sullivan's report is correct?"

"Yes, I believe it is."

Judge J. F. Hicklin, Democrat, ex-prosecuting attorney of Daviess County, said: "I heard Mr. Benton's speech, and I believe that Sullivan's report of it is in the main correct. Benton certainly criticised the President severely on his civil-service record. He claimed as a Democrat the right to express his own opinions, and he did not hesitate to give utterance to them in a forcible manner. I thought at the time that his language was somewhat inappropriate, coming from one of President Cleveland's appointees."

Mr. T. B. Yates, president of the Farmers' Exchange Bank of Gallatin, and a prominent Democrat, had heard Benton's speech. "So far as I remember, Benton criticised the President's civil-service reform policy, and was not very choice in his language, either. I believe he referred to it as civil-service 'humbuggery.' While I hold practically the same views on this subject as Mr. Benton, still it struck me at the time that Mr. Benton might have found something else for discussion in a Democratic speech. I do not think that he should have gone out of his way to find fault with the President. I did not hear Benton's remarks on the silver question."

Mr. D. Harfield Davis, formerly editor of the Gallatin Democrat, said: "The impression produced on me by Benton's speech was very unfavorable to the speaker. I thought that Benton should not have criticised President Cleveland's policy, for the reason that in principle Mr. Benton is as much a part of the administration as is Mr. Cleveland. He did not hesitate to take issue with the President on civil service and the silver question, and expressed himself very forcibly. He did not think that the President had pursued the proper course, and, while I don't remember his exact language, I think that Mr. Sullivan has reported it correctly."

Mr. PLUMB. I do not really think it makes very much difference to any Republican what the Democratic party or any member of it may think, or even what any office-holder may think, about the President of the United States. I introduce this, however, for the purpose of showing the contrast between the action of the President taken in the case of Mr. Benton, who abused his Administration, and the case of Mr. Stone, who made a political speech, in which he did not abuse the Administration.

At the time this was new matter, current news, Hon. John M. Greer, of Pennsylvania, made this certificate:

BUTLER, PA., November 30, 1885.

I was present and heard the speech of Col. William A. Stone, at Butler, and he did not mention the President or his Administration.

JOHN M. GREER.

Yet the President of the United States in his letter in which he refused to reinstate Stone after he had reinstated Benton, alleged as the reason why he did not reinstate Stone, that he (Stone) had abused his Administration. I do not know what he would call abuse if he could not find something of that same kind in the remarks which Mr. Benton undoubtedly made, and which I have quoted.

But, Mr. President, the Democratic party is evidently growing upon the President of the United States since he got into the saddle. He has seen here probably the greatest struggle for office, has participated probably in the greatest scramble for official place that has ever been known on this continent. More aspirants for office have interviewed him, more have solicited him, more solicitations have been made in behalf of applicants by Senators and members of the House than probably ever vexed the eye, the ear, the nostrils of any other President since this Government began.

Last June, shortly after the renomination of the President of the United States, he had occasion to express himself upon certain things in a brief way which will probably find amplification some of these days, if not forgotten, in a letter of acceptance, in a speech which he made to the committee which notified him that he had been nominated as President by the St. Louis convention. I will read a few sentences from his remarks then for the purpose of emphasizing what I have just said about the results of his intercourse with the members of his party. He goes on to say:

This occasion reminds me most vividly of the time when, a few years ago, I received a message from my party similar to that which you now deliver, and with all that has passed since that day I can truly say that the feelings of awe with which I heard the summons then is intensified many fold when it is repeated now.

When I got that far along I thought I understood the President thoroughly; that in view of this pulling and hauling and this contention of the "dirty-socked Democracy," as described by Mr. Benton, in his presence, of this focusing and concentration of all the solicitations for office contained in that party after its hunger of twenty-four years, he naturally must have been inspired with some feeling of awe at least, if not of absolute fear. He continues:

Four years ago I knew that our chief executive office, if not carefully guarded, might drift little by little away from the people, to whom it belonged—and become a perversion of all it ought to be. But I did not know how much its moorings had already been loosened. I knew four years ago how well devised were the feelings of Democracy for the successful operation of a Government by the people and for the people, but I did not know how absolutely necessary their application then was for the restoration to the people of their safety and prosperity.

That was before he had taken office—

There had not been quite as many vetoes during the preceding administration as was necessary, as he seemed to say, in order to assert the executive dignity and its relative importance.

I knew then that abuse and extravagance had crept into the management of public affairs—

He probably had not then footed up the estimates and expenditures of his Administration during the three years since he came into power, and did not then know they were about $100,000,000 in excess of those under his predecessor—but I did not know their numerous forms or the tenacity of their grasp. I knew then something of the bitterness of partisan obstruction, but I did not know how bitter, how reckless, and how shameless it could be. I knew, too, that the American people were patriotic and just, but I did not know how grandly they loved their country nor how noble and generous they were.

The individual who could rise from the contemplation of the feast which the President of the United States has had before him for the last four years and say that until he had entered upon that feast, until he had come for the first time to the city of Washington and been brought in contact with all this self-seeking, with this backbiting, with this defamation and everything of that kind which was voided upon candidates and applicants, etc., in the contention about spoils, that it took an atmosphere of that kind to enable him to know how patriotic the American people were, it seems to me must have lived in an hermetically-sealed vessel somewhere from 1861 to 1865. It is true the city of Buffalo was tolerably near the border, but I think there must have been the sound of fife and drum in the streets there during those perilous times. I think there must have been something to indicate that the great principles and the Government itself were at stake. I think he must have seen, unless he closed his eyes, some one, father, mother, or brother, who sent forth of the bravest and best of their household to be given as a sacrifice on the altar of their country.

I should hope that no one under the flag was obtuse enough to say that that was not patriotic, and that, after having gone through that, side-tracked as he was, out of sympathy, perhaps, with everything that was going on, he never had found in the whole course of his life anything which emphasized the patriotism of the American people until he had come in contact with the so-called "dirty-socked" applicants for office in the Democratic party.

This is a family quarrel, Mr. President, so far as it relates to Mr. Benton and the President. My only excuse for intruding it at all is the fact that the spectacle of the President of the United States holding an even balance between a Republican district attorney and a Democratic district attorney was paraded before the Senate yesterday as the reason why the Senate should visit condemnation upon one of its clerks who had ventured in his off-hours to do exactly what he probably knew was done, what was at all events going on, by a fellow-clerk in the House of Representatives who happened to belong to the other party.

There is more literature upon this subject which I do not care to bring to the attention of the Senate, but there is enough to indicate that Mr. Benton was doing exactly what Mr. Stone was accused of doing, but what Mr. Stone did not do; and that notwithstanding that under the influence of my friend from Missouri, who has a right to plume himself on his influence with this Administration, and is thoroughly entitled to it in every respect, he was enabled to have Mr. Benton reinstated, while Mr. Stone was not reinstated, and therefore the comparison which he invited between the stern Roman virtue of Mr. Cleveland treating Republicans and Democrats alike and this act of partisanship manifested by a clerk of the Senate, it seems to me, fails of its purpose.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have simply to say in reply to that portion of the Senator's remarks in regard to an employé of the House of Representatives who has published a work, as I understand the Senator (for I have never seen it), over his signature as an employé of the House, that if that has been done the same rule should apply to him as to Mr. McKee. No employé of either the Senate or House has the right to publish a partisan work over his official signature. I stated it so distinctly yesterday that nothing but partisan misconstruction could attempt to put any other meaning upon my language. Mr. McKee has the most perfect right to publish what he pleases over his personal signature as a citizen of this Republic, but I state now most emphatically, and I do not think that after the clouds of partisan combat have been removed there can be any doubt about it, that no employé of the Senate, Democratic or Republican, should use his official position to send partisan publications to the people of the United States. If it be done by one side it may be done by the other, and the dignity and fairness which have always characterized the Senate of the United States will most certainly be destroyed by any such proceedings.

In regard to Mr. Benton, that is old straw which has been thrashed time and again. I could detain the Senate for hours reading affidavits to the effect that Mr. Benton made no such utterances as those which have been read by the Senator from Kansas, and it is most astonishing that in all the debates we have in this Chamber which partake of anything like a partisan character, Senators upon that side persist in bringing in the declarations of their own people tinged with partisan malevolence towards their political opponents.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat is the most extreme partisan paper west of the Mississippi River, and notoriously so. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch is not a Democratic paper, but is an independent paper which opposes the Administration when it sees proper to do so and opposes the Democratic party when it sees proper.

Mr. PLUMB. Allow me to ask the Senator in regard to the Post-Dispatch, if it is not published by Mr. Pulitzer, of the New York World?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; it belongs to him.

Mr. PLUMB. The New York World is a Democratic paper. I will ask the Senator if the Post-Dispatch ever supported the Republican ticket? Does it not practically support in Missouri at all times the Democratic ticket, although making short excursions in other directions at times?

Mr. VEST. The Post-Dispatch is an independent paper. It does not consider itself bound by party nominations, and when the Senator asks me if Mr. Pulitzer does not own and conduct that paper, I simply point to an instance in the capital of the country, where the Post is published, and although a majority of the stock is owned by an avowed Democrat, it is published to-day in the interest of the Republican party, and notoriously so.

Mr. BLAIR. The Washington Post?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. I say if it is published intentionally in the interest of the Republican party, it certainly lacks ability to accomplish its own end. [Laughter.]

Mr. VEST. I do not question the right of the Washington Post to declare its sentiments upon one side or the other, but I state most emphatically that if it be a Democratic paper it is the most complete failure politically that has ever been known in journalism in this country. Heaven defend the Democratic party if that is a Democratic paper. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAIR. I did not wish to raise any issue of facts with the Senator, but I do not desire to be understood as assenting to any of his conclusions regarding the Washington Post.

Mr. VEST. I ask nobody to assent to conclusions. I state notorious facts, and I state that the Democratic party is not responsible for the utterances of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch any more than it is for those of the Globe-Democrat, and every Missouri Democrat knows what I say to be true.

When these charges were made against Mr. Benton he promptly and personally over his own signature declared them to be false. Affidavits were obtained, and affidavits could be obtained to any allegation in a partisan canvass. Many of those affidavits came from utterly unreliable sources. Senators drag in here the name of one W. T. Sullivan, who edits a paper in Gallatin, Mo., that in partisan malevolence is a disgrace to journalism and to civilization; a man who when the President of the United States was accused of having committed a disloyal act in removing the Confederate flags, or in proposing to give them back to the States, used language in regard to the President that I will not pollute this presence in quoting; a man who has falsified in every way possible, personally and publicly, the truth in order to defame Democrats and the Democratic organization; a man who manufactured a libel in regard to me personally, without one particle of foundation, simply and solely because I happened to be a Democrat and he a member of the opposite party; a man who would not be believed on oath as to any party matter in the State of Missouri, even by members of his own party.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me hear what the Senator says there. He would not be believed on oath? Does the Senator doubt the independent editor of the St. Louis Post?

Mr. VEST. That publication in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch was made simply as a matter of sensational news, without any personal knowledge on the part of that editor. Mr. Sullivan, of this Gallatin paper, pretended to give his statement——

Mr. PLUMB. But that paper alludes to Judge Ewing, in that county, and another Democrat of the county who made a statement to the effect that Mr. Sullivan had stated the matter about correctly.

Mr. VEST. I have a bundle of papers which would take up the time of the Senate for two hours, showing that Judge Ewing was mistaken, and that Mr. Yates, who made that statement which was read here, afterwards came out in a public card and said he was mistaken. It was in the confusion of a large mass meeting, and we know with what facility men misconstrue the utterances of a stump-speaker in a canvass of great asperity and bitterness. All these facts were laid before the President pro and con, and I made the issue that Benton had been misrepresented, that he had made no such statements, and I filed affidavits in addition to Benton's own personal statement, and the President passed upon the matter as a question of fact and came to the conclusion that Benton had not made these assaults upon his administration which were charged against him.

The Senator from Kansas has taken a wide range in this discussion and comes back to the utterances of the President complimentary toward the people of the United States based upon his more intimate knowledge of them as their chief executive officer. Is it to his discredit that after nearly four years of administration over all the people of the United States he gives this public testimony as to their patriotism and as to their zeal for the welfare of this whole country?

Is that a crime? Would the Senator put a lock upon the President's mouth and if he chances to say anything complimentary to the people of the United States, who have paid him the highest honor that can be given to any mortal man, should that be seized and distorted to his disadvantage? If the Senator wants to go into this whole canvass as to the civil-service reform and the manner in which it has been conducted, I would be glad to know what Senator it was on that side of this Chamber who told Mr. Foster, the chairman of the club association of the Republican party, that he wanted to fry the fat out of the Pennsylvania manufacturers in order to elect a Republican President. If we are to go into crimination and recrimination and cross-examination, let us know who that was, or let us know that Mr. Foster has stated a falsehood publicly over his own signature. The two Senators from Vermont deny emphatically that they made any such statement. Who was it? And when that question is answered, I propose to go further into the details of this campaign.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas, in the course of his remarks, took occasion to refer contemptuously to the "dirty-socked Democracy."

Mr. PLUMB. Oh, no, Mr. President, I only quoted what a member of that party said about it. I did not say anything about it myself.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman first read that remark from a paper and then repeated it on his own responsibility.

Mr. PLUMB. I only repeated it as coming from Mr. Benton. If Mr. Benton is a United States district attorney, he ought to be good Democratic authority. If he is, let the Senator make his complaint of him and not of me.

Mr. REAGAN. I only wish to say that, supposing the Senator from Kansas to be a kind-hearted and good-feeling man, I was inclined to make a suggestion that he ought to be more kindly disposed to those who have been so useful and so serviceable to his party for the last twenty-odd years. We have had a peculiar sort of legislation during the time the Republican party controlled the legislation of Congress; a sort of legislation which had for its object—at least it certainly had for its effect—to tax the laboring masses of the people for the benefit of corporations, bondholders, and other holders of money. "The dirty-socked Democracy" have had a great deal of these taxes to pay; a very great deal.

Mr. PLUMB. I might say that "the dirty-socked Democracy" were the means of creating all of those taxes themselves.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman will not escape the responsibility of what he says by raising a question about the war. I shall not go into that with him and I am not going to raise any question about the amount of debt that was imposed upon the country. I have no fault to find with the action of the Government in its financial policy during the time that debt was created. I doubt not that the best policy which could be pursued under the circumstances was pursued, but the time came when the abundance of paper money and the redundancy of the circulation rendered it of less value than coin; indeed, at one time I believe it took about $2.60 of paper to buy $1 in coin. What I complain of is what occurred after that. The Democracy was not responsible for the fact that in 1869 the Republican party in Congress, with the approval of a Republican President, passed a law which took away from the people the right to pay off the public debt in the kind of currency in which it was created, for up to that time the bonds of the Government were payable in lawful money, in gold and silver coin and in legal-tender notes. Specie payment had been suspended and it was not resumed until nine years after that time, in 1878, and notwithstanding that in 1869 a law was passed by the Republican party in the interest of the bondholders and moneyed classes, under the title of "An act to strengthen the public credit," declaring that the bonded debt should be paid in coin, gold and silver, alone. That reduction of the kinds of money out of which this debt could be paid, that reduction of the volume of the currency out of which this debt could be paid, was not a result of the war. It was the deliberate purpose to increase the value of the bonds and to increase the burdens of the people in order to make the bonds more valuable.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator if he has the slightest doubt that President Cleveland and every Democratic Secretary of the Treasury entirely approved the policy he now criticises?

Mr. REAGAN. It is possible the Senator may be right. I have never agreed with the policy of the Administration on the subject of the finances. I have never concealed the fact that I did not agree with it.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. Does he include the men referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts as among this "dirty-socked Democracy" that he is defending?

Mr. REAGAN. I shall have to let the Senator answer his question for himself. I do not know what class of Democracy he would assign this to. But I desire to say in addition to what I was saying upon that subject that while I do not approve the policy of the Administration upon the subject of coinage and currency, I do approve most heartily of the other policy of the Administration.

Mr. HOAR rose.

Mr. REAGAN. I shall be much obliged to gentlemen if they will allow me to proceed a little while.

I do believe that Mr. Cleveland has given the country a faithful, honest administration that has shown great ability with that grandeur of moral courage which has enabled him under circumstances of great trial to defend the Constitution and under circumstances of greater trial to protect the Treasury of the United States against plunderers, and I feel as anxious for his success in this election as any Senator or any other man in this country, because I believe it is for the best interests of the country that he should succeed. If he happens to agree with the Republican party upon the financial question, and there is no other question upon which he agrees with them. I would not surrender the opportunity of benefiting the country because I may differ with the Administration upon a single question and turn it over to the very party which has enacted the legislation which it is my purpose to call attention to now.

At the time this was done the public debt of the United States was $2,588,000,000. It is difficult to realize what a billion of dollars means. A single billion is more seconds than there have been since the birth of our Saviour. This enormous debt has been hanging over the people, and when the Government found it necessary to improve its currency by a reduction of the volume of its notes, by funding them, in order to induce the funding of them, and I make no question that it was the best to be done under the circumstances, it authorized the sale of bonds for currency at par, and a very large part of the bonds were taken that did not cost the holders more than 50 or 60 cents on the dollar. In 1869, when the currency had somewhat appreciated over what it was when they purchased the bonds, they ought to have consented to let the bonds be paid off in the same sort of currency; but it was the interest of the bondholders, the interest of the money-holders, that they should be paid in coin, though they were bought with paper worth 50 cents on the dollar, and the Republican party gave them that opportunity at the expense of "the dirty-socked Democracy" of this country.

Again, sir, in 1873 the bondholders found that "coin" was not good enough for them, not good enough for the payment of the bonds which cost them 50 cents on the dollar, and then a Republican Congress, with the approval of a Republican President, suspended the coinage of silver and declared it should not be receivable in payment for any debt exceeding $5 in amount in one payment; so that half the metal money of the world was taken away from "the dirty-socked Democracy," who had to aid in the payment of this enormous debt because of the action of the Republican party, and that, too, in the face of the fact that this country was the largest silver producing country in the world, producing at that time, as it does now, about 40 per cent. of all the silver that is mined from the earth, holding a boon in this respect which any other nation on the earth would have paid countless millions to possess; that is, any nation consulting the interests and prosperity of its people; and we who were blessed with this boon of furnishing the country with a metallic money, which had been the money of this country from the foundation of the Government and a part of the money of the world as far back as we know its history or traditions, set aside silver as money in order to increase the value of the bonds held by the bondholders, the pets of the Republican party, and to benefit the bankers and other money holders.

Not content with this, in 1875, when there were only four hundred millions of legal-tender notes still outstanding, the Republican party, with the approval of a Republican President, passed a law requiring that after the 1st of January following the passage of the act they should be canceled, destroyed, and retired from circulation; and that, too, at a time of a financial crisis so appalling as to produce bankruptcy all over this country and caused debtors to be unable to pay their debts, citizens to be unable to pay their taxes; and the newspapers of every county from Maine to California were filled with advertisements of property, real and personal, for sale for taxes. Why? Because of the dearth of currency; because of the contraction which had been produced in the interest of the bondholders for the purpose, as Republicans alleged, of getting down to hard pan, which they seemed to regard as a panacea for all our evils at that time. They passed this law in 1875. So that portion of our money was to be taken away from "the dirty-socked Democracy," who did not hold the offices, who did not pass the laws, and who did not control the public policy, but who had to help foot the bills and pay the taxes. An attempt was made to deprive "the dirty-socked Democracy" of that means of aiding to pay the public debt and their private debts and taxes.

When the Democracy got control of the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress they went to work to repeal the law, after some fifty or more millions had been retired under it, which authorized the taking up of this currency, and they struggled for that until they secured its repeal in 1878 and preserved to the people as currency three hundred and forty-six millions and some odd dollars to aid in the industries of the country and to reward the labor of the country, and preserved it as money for the use of the people, instead of making it a bonded debt to increase the burdens of the people still more.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. I would ask, in the first place, whether he does not recall that Mr. Manning, the late Secretary of the Treasury under this Administration, in his report for 1886 recommended the retirement of all the greenback notes?

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman need not quote that authority upon me. He need not quote it upon the Democratic party. The Democratic party is not responsible, it never was responsible for it, as test votes in the two Houses of Congress for twelve or fourteen years have shown conclusively, and I hope the gentleman will not put Republican doctrine to me to know whether the Democratic party is responsible for it.

Mr. PLUMB. Inasmuch as the Senator says that the Democratic party is not responsible for Mr. Manning, let me ask who is responsible?

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman can have his opinion about that. I simply desire to add a few words to what I have said, if the gentleman will allow me. He can state what he pleases when I yield the floor. I will be soon through.

I was showing that as soon as the Democrats got control of the House of Representatives they commenced the struggle to repeal that law and preserve the currency. I say the Democrats did it, because in the House of Representatives the great body of the Democrats voted for it, while a good many Republicans, mostly Western Republicans, did so too, but the majority was Democratic, and in the Senate the same sort of public opinion, although it was a Republican Senate, aiding the Democratic policy, struck down this blow at the industrial interests of the country.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator will permit me to ask him who was the member of the House of Representatives who introduced the bill of which he has spoken?

Mr. REAGAN. I can not call the particular name, but there were a great many bills introduced.

Mr. PLUMB. The bill that was actually passed, I will say for the Senator's information, and he can easily verify it, was introduced by Mr. FORD, of Illinois, a Republican Representative from that State.

Mr. REAGAN. There were some Western Republicans very earnestly in favor of this measure, but I say it was the Democratic party which repealed the Republican legislation on that subject; and when I speak of the Democratic and Republican parties, I mean the controlling elements of those two parties. At the same time the Democratic party undertook the work of trying to remonetize silver and make it again a part of the money of this country, and in 1878 the same class of Republicans, Western Republicans, representing agricultural and industrial interests in this country outside of corporations, aided them to secure the coinage of silver dollars in an amount of not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 a month, making them a lawful tender in all payments and providing for silver certificates and making them a legal tender for taxes and dues of all kinds to the Government, thus restoring to the American people the use of the $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes, and restoring to the people the use of their traditional coin money.

This was some of the work of "the dirty-socked Democracy" in trying to help themselves into a position of some sort of capacity to help pay the enormous taxes which had been imposed on them by the Republican party for the purpose of aiding and enriching and making millionaires of bondholders and other money lords.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Texas seems to have got away from the line of discussion which preceded his remarks into what was a very interesting field, however, and all the more interesting because, if I understand him, the policy of this Administration, which he does not deny, is one which makes the difference between poverty and affluence; and yet, if I understand him, not so much by what he said as by what he expects to do and what he is now doing, he is supporting the very Administration which makes this difference, and that is a difference by which this Administration is put on the side of affluence and against that of poverty.

Mr. REAGAN. I want to tell the Senator that I would rather have one branch of the Government wrong than to let the Republican party govern, which is wrong all over.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator found but one thing that was wrong, or, at all events, which he thought it was proper to characterize, and that was the question of dealing with the currency; and now he confesses that this Democratic Administration is pursuing a policy in the interest of the bondholders which is against the people, which makes for affluence against poverty, which is in favor of classes against the masses, and yet on that very strong declaration he finds it in his way to very zealously support such an Administration. I think by the time he has had some further experience of this Administration he will probably become as complacent as some others have become. I will call his attention to the fact that not only is this Administration so minded, but that the Senate at the present session, on one of the days of last March, passed an act providing for the issuance of silver certificates to take the place of retiring national-bank notes in order that there might be no further contraction of the currency, and the Democratic House of Representatives has not only side-tracked it, but made it absolutely certain that it will not be passed at least during this session. So it seems to me that the Senator must not quarrel only with one branch of the Government controlled by his party, but with both of them.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I sympathize very deeply with my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], concurring with him in much that he has said. There have been serious mistakes in our financial legislation, and particularly in the legislation relating to silver. I appreciate the embarrassment under which he labors and the necessity for some excuse for supporting the present Administration and the re-election of Mr. Cleveland. Since Mr. Cleveland was elected President the price of silver has been depreciated, mainly by his efforts, over 17 per cent. Two-thirds or nearly three-fourths of the two Houses declared that under the laws as they existed every dollar of public debt was payable in either gold or silver, after full discussion in the Senate and the House in 1878, and in the same year the Bland act was passed providing for the coinage of a limited amount of silver. Notwithstanding all this, after the election of Mr. Cleveland, but before he was inaugurated, he sent a message or wrote a letter to the Democratic members of the Forty-eighth Congress strongly urging, if I remember correctly, the repeal of the Bland act and all laws providing for the coinage of silver, and assigning as a reason that if they were not repealed we might be driven to the humiliating position of paying in silver bonds which ought to be paid in gold, and he predicted all sorts of ruin if that was not done.

Further along in the summer, in July, 1885, he authorized a gentleman by the name of George Walker, consul-general at Paris, to attend the monetary convention that convened in Paris at that time, and who informed them that the public sentiment in the United States had changed; that there was a growing sentiment in favor of the repeal of the Bland act, and that his administration would do all it could to accomplish that purpose. When Congress assembled he informed us of what he had done in that regard. Not only that, but on the assembling of Congress in 1885 he repeated his urgent request.

Mr. REAGAN. I want to ask the Senator if the President said that.

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. REAGAN. I had not heard that before.

Mr. STEWART. I am not quoting his exact language; I am giving the substance of it. The President in his message to Congress indorsed what George Walker had stated to the monetary conference and said that he had sent him there for that purpose. Then when Congress assembled in 1885, the President sent an urgent message demanding nearly, urging at all events, the immediate repeal of the Bland act and the discontinuance of the coinage of silver, and predicting ruin to the country if it was not done.

Following that, in 1886 he sent a similar message with a similar prediction.

That is not all. The persons whom he selected to go to Europe to consult European financiers as to the silver question were monometallists—Manton Marble in 1885 and Edward Atkinson in 1887.

The fact has already been adduced that we amended the bond-purchasing bill in the Senate by a vote of 28 to 13 by adding an amendment requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase and coin sufficient silver to take the place of the national-bank notes retired and so to prevent further contraction. It is understood to-day, and it has never been denied, that through the influence of the Treasury Department that bill was smothered in the Committee on Ways and Means in the other House, and the House has not had an opportunity to vote for it, because it is very well known that in that House probably three to one are really in favor of the free coinage of silver. When the Democratic national convention met it put nothing in its platform in regard to silver, although a large part of the party were in favor of doing so, bowing to the President's will in that regard.

The election of President Cleveland with his disposition to use the veto power makes it almost impossible that there should be any relief in the next four years from this oppression if he shall be re-elected. He is in favor of the single gold standard and the payment of bonds in gold. All his Secretaries of the Treasury have advocated that policy, and the re-election of Cleveland holds out to the country that policy and only that policy, and going so far as to take the legal-tender power from all greenbacks, to withdraw the legal-tender power of greenbacks, and to proceed to get to the single gold standard. The Senator well knows what effect that has produced upon this country. He knows very well that the prices of wheat and cotton have followed the price of silver down. Every fall in silver has produced a like fall in wheat and cotton. He knows very well that the purchasing power of silver in every country which has retained silver for its legal standard is the same that it ever has been, that a rupee in India will buy as much wheat to-day as it ever would, and he knows very well that that gives the English operator the chance to come to America and buy cheap silver, buy it at over 30 per cent. discount and invest it in wheat in India at par, and by means of which last year India exported to the European markets about 40,000,000 bushels of wheat. She had no exports of wheat at the time silver was demonetized.

He knows very well that it is cheap silver that enables India and Russia and other wheat-producing countries that retain the silver standard to undersell American wheat in a market where it has to be paid for with gold. He knows very well, if he has studied this question, that cotton and wheat are both lower than they ever were in the history of the world; they have reached a lower point in value. He knows very well how the property of the people of this country is mortgaged, how impossible it is for them to relieve themselves from the pressure of these mortgages on account of the low price of wheat and cotton and the high price of money. He knows very well that Mr. Cleveland has the same view that the bankers have of good money. "Good money" with them means scarce money; "good money" with the bankers means hard times. That is their definition of it, and still you hear them quoted as authority.

Why do you not quote the various trusts? Why do you not quote the whisky trust and the cotton trust and the sugar trust and the Standard Oil trust and other trusts? Why do you not quote the declarations of those concerned in them in favor of trusts to prove that those trusts are proper? And why do we have constantly quotations from the money trust? Why do we have in the Treasury Department only those who are taught to believe that there can be no good money but scarce and dear money; that when money is sufficiently plenty so that the people can prosper, that is bad money. Why does this Administration continue to intrench in that Department people that only view one side of the question, only view the interest of the bondholders? Why is it that the Senator is supporting such an Administration as that?

Mr. REAGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. I would rather not be interrupted for a minute. I have some other things to say.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to ask the Senator a question at that point.

Mr. STEWART. I know the Senator from Texas at heart is in favor of the people; I know he is opposed to the oppression that the President of the United States is bringing upon his country; I know he sympathizes with the farmers who are being sold out; I know that he wants silver remonetized; but he has fallen into another trap which will be as severe on them as this. If he will read the history of the past, if he will use sound common sense, he will know that the more goods bought abroad the more money will be sent out to buy the goods and to pay balances. If he will examine the history of the tariff of 1833 when it got in full operation, with a sliding scale as it had, when the full force of it was reached, it bore this country into that crisis of 1837 which robbed every enterprise of success, made bankruptcy everywhere and distress universal, when all the money was taken from the country. It became dearer than by any other act of contraction, it became dearer even than by the demonetization of silver. Property was valueless because there was no money with which to buy it. The circulating medium was sent abroad. It was sent abroad to pay for the glut, as Lord Brougham called it. He said the English could well afford after the war of 1812 to lose money by flooding and destroying the American market and forcing us to take their commodities. I say that glut took the money from this country in 1837.

Will the Senator look a little further? It is true the act of 1846 did not produce as bad effects as that of 1833, and there are very few who understand the reason why. It would have produced ruin but for two circumstances. The Mexican war made business. The people can stand almost anything in war. And then the gold from California came in time to save the country from bankruptcy, to furnish a constant flow of gold to be exported. It induced railroad building and enterprise, and the country endured that tariff for eleven years. But it will be remembered at the end of eleven years the fatal tariff act of 1857 was passed, and notwithstanding the flow of gold continued that was the last straw which broke the camel's back. The glut came, the money went, and again came universal bankruptcy. And now at this crisis, when the money is contracted, and when this Administration is advocating its further contraction, when prices are lower than they have been in a hundred years, when the Western farms are covered with mortgages, when the loss of our circulating medium would be fatal, the Senator, I understand, is in favor—I hope he is not, but I fear he is in favor—of free trade, in favor of taking off our tariff, in favor of allowing England and all the world to throw their surplus in here again. Withdraw our currency and then you will have dear money.

These I understand to be the cardinal principles of this Administration—the single gold standard, the withdrawal of our scanty circulating medium to buy goods abroad, whereby the people of this country will be deprived of money with which to do business; and the Senator contemplates with complacency the picture that is before him here of inevitable bankruptcy from the policy of this President, and still his Democracy holds him to it. I know the Senator is a patriotic man; I know that he believes in the people. I have spoken in his praise to my people for the efforts he made in behalf of silver and other great reforms, but I am sorry to see him now following the lead of this man who is in sympathy with the single gold standard and free trade, the twin sisters of destruction to our people. The single gold standard contracts the currency; free trade withdraws what is left and leaves the country in ruin. I am sorry, I say, that my friend from Texas can contemplate with composure the spectacle that is before him with the election of Mr. Cleveland, if that calamity can possibly happen.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Nevada for his kindness and sympathy and sorrow for my unfortunate position. I simply ask him to reverse that picture and look through the other end of the glass. The Republican party, which brought about the condition of things which contracted the currency, which demonetized silver, and which is responsible for it, has no condemnation from him, and he is supporting that party when he knows that the great body of the Democratic party agrees in sentiment with him, and the Democrats in both Houses of Congress hold the same views which he does, and yet he fails to act with them and acts and votes with the party that has produced the very condition of things which he laments and condemns.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. We know two things which reconcile me to my position. We know that Cleveland will veto any bill giving relief looking to the remonetization or recoinage of silver, and we know that Harrison will not.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not see how the Senator knows that. If he does, he knows that Mr. Harrison has changed his position since he was in Congress. I see no indication of it, and Senator Harrison, the Republican candidate for President, would not dare to avow what the Senator avows for him. If he did, he would lose the support of the very men who are urging his election, because he is a practical representative of those who favor class interests at the expense of the public.

But I have no speech to make. I simply want the Senator to reverse that glass and look at himself supporting and vindicating a party that brought these things about and refusing to act with the great body of the Democratic party in correcting them. I shall express no sorrow for it. He does not want that. If he does not mind he will express the sorrow for himself after a little while.

Mr. STEWART. I like my condition. The Republican party has declared in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money—not as a depreciated coinage, but as money. The Republican party is the party in favor of the tariff and opposed to the withdrawal of what money we have to buy goods elsewhere, which is the precipice over which if we ever step ruin is inevitable, because it has always followed. Like causes will continue to produce like effects. Free trade will contract the currency, destroy business, and produce bankruptcy. We have as much contraction as we can stand. I will go with Democrats or Republicans for any measure of reform, but I will not fight under the banner of any man who I know is in favor of either free trade or the contraction of the currency to further rob the people, and I will not act in conjunction with any clique in New York of importers, agents for foreign manufacturers, to enable them to get our markets for Europeans, nor will I act in harmony with their coadjutors, their partners, the money kings, who like free-traders because they are connected in business with free-traders, and also because free trade will make money scarcer in this country and enhance the value of their bonds and their money. I say that I will not fight under that banner, and I am astonished that any Democrat should fight under a chieftain who believes in contracting the currency by narrowing it down to a gold standard and then robbing the people of what is left by sending the money abroad to buy commodities elsewhere.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, it is rather a difficult thing, at least I should imagine it would be, for one to take part in funeral exercises with the corpse absent, which is my situation just now, for I intended to address myself to the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] for a moment, but he has disappeared, and I will say what little I have to say without any very special reference to him.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to call up the Chinese bill, and let him go on upon that? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAIR. Not now, though I may be able to say a word or two that will be appropriate to that.

The Senator from Texas ought to be sympathized with by everybody on both sides of the Chamber because of the remarks which have been made by him which have grown out of the confusion of mind that evidently exists either on his part or on that of the rest of us.

Mr. COCKRELL. The "corpse" is here.

Mr. BLAIR. I see. That proves the doctrine of the resurrection. It does not show that what I said is not true, but simply demonstrates the doctrine of the resurrection. I am glad to see him.

The Senator from Texas is nothing unless he is accurate, accurate in statistics; and so knowing that his figures would be true if anything he said was true, I listened to what he said in endeavoring to magnify the sorrows of the country, to give us an idea of the enormous pecuniary burdens of taxation that we were suffering under, and especially that mud-socked Democracy, who, it seems, are paying all the sum, although unable to supply themselves with decent socks. In endeavoring to give us a correct mathematical idea of the oppression they were suffering under he sought to fasten in the mind some notion of its enormous significance by the word "billion," and he said to us "a billion, why, what is a billion?" Then he said it was a larger number than all the seconds of time since the commencement of the Christian era. I knew that to be true if anything he said was true, and so I went to work while he was delivering himself of the other matter which would be of less importance I knew than these statistics—we can tie to statistics; you know that figures will not lie, although those who make them can, but the Senator is not one of those who do lie about figures; he is accurate on figures if on anything—so I made the calculation, and I find, unless my figures lie—I have been over them twice—that since the commencement of the Christian era there have been just 59,539,-968,000 seconds of time. I take it that is about sixty times as many as the Senator says, and I think he has given us about one-sixtieth part of the truth in his general utterances making up the balance of his speech, certainly not more, because the figures, in which he was likely to be most accurate, are sixty times out of the way.

Mr. President, the Senator should be sympathized with in another regard, and that is that he failed to draw a distinction between the two great divisions which exist in the Democracy. He spoke of that mud-socked Democracy that pays all the taxation of the country, it seems, for the Senator did not in his remarks intimate at all that any Republican, North or South, contributed a dollar towards the taxation that has fallen upon the country, but it is all taken out of the mud-socked Democracy; but when I intimated to him that there might be some other wing of the Democracy he would not answer my question, you recollect. He omits wholly the great silk-stocking Democracy to which his President and almost every leader of his party belongs that has anything whatever to do with shaping its policy or dictating the condition or issues of this campaign. The Senator is, like myself, likely to be right, even to the extent of being sometimes called "a crank."

I have before this time welcomed him to my spacious bosom as an advocate of the great doctrine of prohibition, and I have a sort of feeling of sympathy for him in the minority in his difficulties in his own party in other directions in the lone and humble and humiliating position which he occupies among this mud-socked Democracy. I sympathize with him. When occasionally he does not see how to appear in the campaign until a little too late, I do not blame him for assailing Cleveland and Bayard and Barnum and Brice and all those men constituting the silk-stocking Democracy, which dictated the policy of which he complains, and who are the only arbiters of the fate of the Democratic party, and unfortunately at the present time of the country itself. I have a feeling of sympathy for him. I have found no difficulty in acquiescing in the most of what he said, because what he said, if it were true, was more true than of anybody else of the silk-stocking Democracy, which is seeking again to be elevated to power and to perpetrate and continue these outrages for at least four years more.

Mr. President, this is a war of newspapers to some extent. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] a few days since made some allusion to the New York Tribune, and I have an editorial from the New York Tribune which I wish to put in the RECORD, because it is so true. I know the Senator will call it good authority. His partisan feeling occasionally may incline him to criticise what is said in a Republican newspaper and say it is a lie, as he did say very plainly and bluntly in reference to all the contents of the New York Tribune as a partisan paper. The New York Tribune, the Senator ought to know, is the only reliable newspaper in the city of New York of political character, except the Sun, to be sure, which is somewhat similar in its character and position, I think, to the New York Post, so far as its political attitude is concerned. I must make a reservation in favor of the Sun, except so far as it attacks me, but so far as the World is concerned I have nothing to say. I believe the editor, proprietor, and inspirer, the great immaculate spirit of the World, had the benefit of a residence in the State of Missouri and in the city of St. Louis for a considerable time, and no doubt has imbibed that sense of integrity and high honor and fidelity to party principles which characterize everything and everybody coming from that locality; but as for the New York Tribune, it is a truthful newspaper, and the Senator and others should not impeach its veracity simply because occasionally it is severe upon the Democratic party.

The Senator knows, we all know that the more profound and the more conscientious and the more just a judge, the more certain he is to pronounce sentence of death occasionally. No guilty man escapes if the judge be what he should be. And occasionally the New York Tribune has good cause to pronounce sentence of death on the Democratic party. The sin is not in the Tribune but in the party that commits the crime. I doubt not, I believe that a higher power than the New York Tribune has again pronounced sentence of political death against that party, and I trust we shall see its execution in November. But in regard to this duality which exists in the Democratic party, I find an editorial in the Tribune, to which I have been alluding, which I think explains it all. It is rather personal to Mr. Cleveland, and I will strike out the word "Cleveland" and insert the word "Democracy," because it will be such a source of relief to my friend from Texas to explain the whole thing in the future. These debates can go on, the Senator from Texas can defend his mud-socked Democracy and the silk-stocking Democracy, and we can have this confusion of persons, but all fall back on this editorial of the Tribune, which is in this morning's publication, which I now send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read, because he will read it so much better than I could.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE SECRET OUT.

The explanation of the extraordinary delay in Mr. Cleveland's letter of acceptance is easy. Like the rest of mankind the President is afflicted, as we long ago made known, with a dual personality; but in his case the ordinary conditions are reversed. The Jekyll, who favors reform and is animated by patriotic and statesmanlike purposes, is feeble and small of build. The Hyde is large and powerful and fat. When Mr. Cleveland was first nominated——

Mr. BLAIR. That should be "Democracy." Insert "Democracy" instead of "Cleveland." [Laughter.] However, go on and read it as it is in the paper.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

When Mr. Cleveland was first nominated he was touched by this mark of confidence on the part of his fellow-men. Jekyll came uppermost. He saw, knowing as he did the irrepressible wickedness of Hyde, that unless he were checked at the outset he would use every cunning and wicked device to bring about his re-election. So Jekyll wrote the passage in the letter of acceptance which served notice on Hyde that he must not dare to think of a second term. But the ink was hardly dry before that wily and unscrupulous character began his evil machinations, and Hyde, being by far the stronger personality of the two, invariably gains the victory in the end. The sending of that ten-thousand-dollar check to the Democratic national committee was a critical point in this tremendous struggle, of which no hint so far has escaped to the outside public. Jekyll knows that he can not consistently or with any propriety accept the nomination, and is making a brave fight for a clean record. But what are consistency and propriety to Hyde? When, therefore, he succeeded in sending the ten-thousand-dollar check it was with a chuckle of ghoulish glee, for he knew then that he had committed Jekyll, and while the final acceptance might be long delayed, it must come sooner or later. It is even said that the check was signed by Edward Hyde, and not by Dr. Jekyll at all. But the national committee accepted it without question, because they know that Mr. Cleveland has bank accounts in both names, and draws on Hyde's much more frequently than on Jekyll's.

This disclosure must arouse a great popular sympathy with Mr. Cleveland. We can easily imagine now what fearful struggles have been going on in the White House, at the dead of night, when Jekyll was straining every nerve to conquer his familiar demon. If Jekyll could have had his way we might have had a model administration, within its intellectual limitations, but Hyde's unconquerable depravity has kept his wretched victim continually in hot water. It was Jekyll who promised to be a civil-service reformer, but Hyde made the appointments, and so it was that about two hundred persons directly connected with the criminal classes got into Federal office in three years. It was Jekyll who wrote such beautiful letters to George William Curtis, but to what end? Hyde had no sooner been inaugurated than he struck up a violent friendship with GORMAN and sat up late nights with him planning political rascality. It is Hyde who writes all the pension vetoes and sneers at the soldiers and their widows. It was Hyde who wanted to return the rebel flags, but the outcry frightened even him. It was Hyde who, after a long and frightful combat, succeeded in getting possession of the President's pen last December and wrote the free-trade message, because it is the one craving of his nature to smash things. It was Hyde who determined that there must be a bid made for the Irish vote, and so wrote the retaliation message in spite of Jekyll's wailing remonstrances that his entire policy on this question was being revised and made ridiculous. It was Hyde, too, who dictated the new anti-Chinese bill.

For ninety-one long days now this contest has lasted, and it can not continue much longer. The sending of the $10,000 check was a sign that Jekyll is fast losing his strength and must soon succumb. It will not be many days now before we shall have a letter in which nothing will be said concerning "the allurements of power" and "the temptation to retain public places once gained," but in which the nomination for a second term will be eagerly, even greedily, accepted. The letter will be signed by Jekyll, but we shall all recognize between the lines the cunning and unscrupulous hand of Edward Hyde.

Mr. BLAIR. I only want to say that I should like to have that paper preserved.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, in answer to the important facts I have presented the genial Senator from New Hampshire treats us to a chapter of wit. Perhaps that is the best escape from the consideration of those great facts. He made his point of attack that I had made a mistake about the number of seconds since the birth of our Saviour. That shows the danger of guessing at billions; and he said that I was as nearly accurate in that as in any other proposition which I have made. Now, I submit to the Senator that I was not mistaken in saying that on the 18th of March, 1869, when the public debt amounted to $2,588,000,000, the Republican party took away from the people the right to pay that debt in the sort of money in which it had been created. I do not think I was mistaken in that. Nor was I mistaken in saying that on the 25th of February, 1873, the Republican party passed an act demonetizing silver and taking away from the people the right to pay the public debt in silver. I do not think I was mistaken in that. Nor was I mistaken in saying that on January 14, 1875, the Republican party provided for the taking up and cancellation and retirement from circulation of nearly $400,000,000 of legal-tender notes then in circulation. I do not think I was mistaken in that. Those were the material facts which I presented and which have caused the Senator such a labored effort at wit.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Just reserve the question for a moment. I want to complete this without interruption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be temporarily laid aside to proceed to the consideration of the House bill excluding Chinese.

Mr. REAGAN. I should be glad if the Senator would allow me to conclude.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator can make his remarks when that bill is up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the pending order, being the unfinished business, may be laid aside for the purpose of resuming the consideration of House bill No. 11536.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Nevada to withhold his request, or rather to let the resolution upon which the Senator from Texas is now addressing the Senate remain before the Senate until the conclusion of his remarks. I apprehend there will be no objection to then proceeding to the consideration of the bill at the end of that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent to be permitted to conclude his observations on the resolution, as that was under consideration during the morning hour. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, the hardest blow that the Senator from New Hampshire, with all his goodness, inflicted upon me was in his attempt to draft me into the ranks of cranks, of which he is so distinguished a leader. The Senator has undertaken the mission of educating all the American people. He has undertaken the mission of making them all temperate. He has undertaken the mission of providing that all women shall vote. I do not remember all the other missions he has undertaken or may undertake, but if there is another absurdity that can be presented the Senator will father that and urge it. He has a very large missionary field, enough for a very considerable corps of statesmen and others. I am not a volunteer in his ranks, and I trust he will not draft me into his ranks. I do not propose to go that way.

The Senator has this much to say, that I did vote for prohibition in my State. The question was submitted as a non-partisan question, and I chose to exercise my judgment upon that question as I do upon others, and I am not in the habit of asking how others think about a question when facts enough come before me to determine what I ought to do.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to suggest that those are the most positive and absolute characteristics of a crank—a man who exercises his own judgment? [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator ought to know what a crank is, as he now enjoys the privilege of being a crank and a leader of cranks; but I protest against being drafted into his ranks.

Mr. BLAIR. Why will not the Senator then serve as a volunteer, if he will not allow me to draft him?

Mr. REAGAN. I shall not spend time in offering reasons why I shall not do that, beyond referring to the absurdity of most of the measures he advocates. When he wants me to set out to educate all the American people——

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator ought to be accurate. I showed him about figures awhile ago. I never thought of trying to educate all the American people as old as he is. No proposition was ever offered by me except to educate those between the ages of ten and twenty-one years. I always knew water ran down hill; I can not remember the time I did not know that water ran down hill, yet, being a crank, people have claimed that I have introduced a bill to have water run up hill towards Canada. [Laughter.] I know water will run down hill.

Mr. REAGAN. It is better, I think, for me and perhaps for the country that the Senator has not undertaken to educate me, and that on account of my age I am beyond the reach of his attempts at education.

Neither could the Senator help his sneer, which came also from others of his party, about the dirty, mud-socked Democracy, and he assumed that I alleged that they paid all the taxes. I made no such assumption; but I do not hold the Senator responsible for not being accurate; he could not help it. I said they were charged with the burden of having to aid in paying these taxes.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will permit me to make a suggestion, and that is, that he get an extension of time simply to conclude his own remarks, and if he will occasionally allow me to interject a question it would be a great deal better in the RECORD, and he will get through. However, I will not trouble the Senator.

Mr. REAGAN. I was saying that he could not help a sneer at the mud-socked Democracy.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the Senator proceeds further will he allow me to say——

Mr. REAGAN. I must deprive the Senator of that opportunity for one minute.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well; I will wait.

Mr. REAGAN. I was saying that the party the Senator belongs to and sustains oppresses the poor for the benfit of the rich, and he knows it as well as I do. They dare not do otherwise. Their chance for promotion to power rests upon the idea of the support of the corporations and the money power. They know it, and shape their policy to that end, and the Senator knows it; and in promoting the interests of corporations and monopolies they oppress the mass of the people.

It was these questions that I was calling the attention of the honorable Senator to and would have been glad to hear him on, as glad even as I was to hear the splendid wit he has exhibited in order to avoid the real issue.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will allow me a moment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to proceed on the resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Texas is quite mistaken about my feeling towards that mud-socked Democracy. There is no mud-socked Democracy in my belief; we are all American citizens, and the mud-socked Democracy is as much a part of the great citizenship of this country, and their interests are as dear to me as they are to the Senator from Texas. They are as much, I say, a part of the citizenship of this great country as are "the mud-sills" of the North who saved it. I am one of those who belong to "the mud-sills," and they include the mud-socked Democracy, and they include the rank and file and the leadership of the Republican party, and they have done so from the origin of the application of the principles which have vitalized the Republican party and saved the nation.

Now, sir, the Senator from Texas—he a leader in the rebellion which would have brought us into a dishonored grave as a nation—undertakes to force upon the American people, and to enforce it here in the Senate of the United States, the doctrine that the Republican party is the enemy of the common citizenship of this country, and that it is under the leadership and control of the aristocratic and moneyed power. Why, Mr. President, the Republican party is the savior of the country, and in it and in its platform and in its personnel are embodied all the great principles for which the fathers fought and in the victory of which alone is to be found the ultimate political and other salvation of this country.

Now, Mr. President, look at it for a moment. If the Democracy of which the Senator was a leader, the Democracy which is led by the same sentiment and the same individualship to-day, if that Democracy had had its way, what sort of labor would have been brought into this country? What would have prevailed here? Of what use your Chinese discussion of yesterday had the Democracy that advocated the immigration of the Chinese in the first instance had their way? What would have been the result? Chinese cheap labor and slavery all over the great West, west of the Mississippi River, and now extending itself over and dominating that country. Either that or the Democracy, which was active a little earlier, would have filled every inch of space west of the Mississippi River with slave negro labor, which would have been cheaper and worse than Chinese labor itself.

Is not that so? Did not the Democracy go to war in order that they might establish that style of labor, slave labor, all over this continent, or at least in every portion of this continent where under State control free principles had not already prevailed, and that beyond the power of the national action of the Democracy? Did they not go to war and undertake the destruction of the Government itself, in order that they might plant negro slavery all over every other part of the great domain of the nation? The Senator knows it. That is the record of his party within the recollection of every individual who listens to me to-day. And those men who were for Chinese labor, who were for negro slavery earlier—and Chinese labor is only another form of slavery—these men in the Senate Chamber hour after hour harp about the oppression of the Republican party, which was always their antipodes—the oppression which the Republican party would exercise towards the common citizenship of this country! If there is a free principle in the United States or in the world, the Republican party is alone in accordance with it and is its necessary advocate to-day. The Senator knows it. I do not undertake to impeach his sincerity. His strong prejudices, his early training, his identification with the great organization that assumed but for a time a contingent nationality, enables him to utter sentiments on this floor in the utmost sincerity which are not in accord with the truths of history or the convictions of enlightened mankind.

The Senator is all wrong about this. The mud-sills of the North and the mud-socked Democracy of the South are identical, and when that school bill, which the Senator has sneered at so much has done its work and educated, not the old men who are beyond hope and in whose political death alone lies hope for a great future—I say when that school bill has done its work among the children of the mud-socked Democracy of the South, as it has already done its work by previous enactments of the same kind at least all over the North, then the Senator will find that the Republican party, which he undertakes to impeach, will dominate not alone in the North but dominate in his own section; and there will be hope for the great State of Texas then.

Mr. REAGAN. May I trespass upon the patience of the Senate a few minutes longer?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed on the resolution.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator will allow the Chinese bill to come up, and then he can speak.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Texas proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, the last resort of a Republican politician when he is cornered is to appeal to the sectional troubles which existed a quarter of a century ago, and to appeal to the passions and prejudices which grew out of those unfortunate troubles. The Senator from New Hampshire alleges that they grew out of a purpose on the part of those who favored the Confederacy to establish a system of negro slave-labor over all the territory west of the Mississippi River. If the Senator had read the history of those times he would know that he is very much mistaken in making such a statement as that.

There was a controversy about whether the State of Kansas should have free or slave labor. There was never a controversy about any territory north of the State of Kansas being free territory or being occupied by slaves.

But the Senator can not help a sneer at the institution of slavery and at the action of men who sustained the Confederacy. He thinks it was all for the purpose of maintaining slavery. If the Senator were familiar with the history of the country he would perhaps feel more kindly towards that section, and he would remember that slavery was introduced into the American colonies by Great Britain, and France, and Spain, and by the Dutch merchants.

He would remember that it existed in every one of the thirteen colonies at the date of the Declaration of Independence; he would remember that it was perpetuated by the Constitution and the laws of the United States and by the decisions of the highest courts; he would remember that Presidents and Senators and Representatives and governors of States and Congresses and Legislatures sustained the institution of slavery because it had been transmitted to our people as a heritage for which, whether for good or evil, they were not responsible.

The Senator must have a very bad opinion of President Washington, who was a slaveholder; of Mr. Jefferson, of Mr. Madison, of President Jackson, of President Polk, of President Taylor, all of whom were slaveholders and all of whom were elected by the people of the United States. He must have a very bad opinion of the great and illustrious patriots who framed the Constitution of the United States, because they not only perpetuated slavery but they provided in that great instrument to perpetuate the African slave-trade for twenty years after the adoption of the Constitution.

Now, sir, it seems to me if the Senator would allow himself to read history, to understand facts, he would find that the people were placed in a condition with reference to that question which was not at that time in antagonism with the advanced sentiments of the most enlightened nations of the world on this subject. The institution of slavery was the subject of sectional agitation, which caused great anxiety to the people of the Southern States.

The slaves represented, in the hands of their owners, three thousand millions of property, as was then estimated; and while the Southern people were not more responsible than the Senator and his friends, all of them, for the existence and continuance of slavery, none of the latter proposed to take any of the burdens upon themselves. If it was a national wrong, it had been entailed upon us by the Federal Constitution; if it was a grievance, if it was a thing that ought to have been disposed of because it was a national evil, the way to dispose of such a question was not by a bloody conflict, but by an arrangement for the purchase of the slaves and the freeing of them. No proposition of that kind was made. The consequences were all entailed upon the people who happened to have them after those of the Northern and Eastern States had sold theirs to the South because white labor was cheaper, and got the money to build up their factories.

The Southern people did not desire to propagate slavery—that was not their point; but the idea was to prevent sectional agitation, to prevent strife, to save themselves from the calamity of a war of races. In that condition, under an agitation that had lasted for thirty years, a President and Vice-President were selected representing the anti-slavery sentiment of the country as a culmination of the crusade against the institution of slavery within the States. Up to that time we had recognized that the States had their domestic institutions and that the Federal Government had no business to interfere with them; that each State under the Constitution had the right to take charge of and control its own institutions. But the Southern people were placed in a helpless minority under the pressure of the crusade against the institution entailed upon them by the mother country and other nations, and by the convention which formed the Constitution; they were unable to relieve themselves, and they believed that this crusade would expose them to a war of races and the desolation of the country.

The Senator never stops to think of that. I know that generally he is a kind-hearted man and sympathizes with the wrongs of the weak and the oppressed, but he seems not to have thought of the condition in which that people were placed and of the fact that they felt that rather than risk servile insurrection and a war of races, they had better, like true men, imperil their own lives in order to keep the control of their domestic institutions free from the intermeddling of others who were not responsible for them. I trust the Senator will look more kindly upon our people and will remember that there was no purpose of aggression. Self-preservation was all that there was in that movement, the preservation of the rights of the States, of the property of individuals, and of the liberty of the citizen, not the propagation of slavery.

The Senator ought to know that the people of that section of this country would not madly, foolishly, and weakly go into a contest in which the chances by numbers, by wealth, by material resources, were all against them; that nothing but the direst necessity of self-preservation could have induced them to accept a conflict in which the chances of success were, within their own knowledge, against them, but were impelled by a condition of things in which they felt that it was more honorable to die fighting for their rights than to live passive slaves to those who proposed to intermeddle with and control their rights.

I have never made any expression before in Congress on this subject. I have desired to avoid reference to it. It can do no good. It may stir up evil passions, and any remarks which I have now made are not, so far as I am concerned, intended to appeal to passion or prejudice, but to appeal to that Senator's better nature to inquire into the facts which brought about that struggle, and see if he is not mistaken in calling it, as he has so often done here, a wicked rebellion, a causeless rebellion. Surely no one familiar with the history of the country and not blinded by passion and prejudice could assume that it was either causeless or wicked. There was no purpose to interfere with the liberties of others, but simply a purpose on the part of our people to try to take care of themselves in the condition in which they found themselves without their fault and without the power to relieve themselves.

I always regret when this question is made a subject of discussion here. I know how well calculated it is to revive passions that it were well for the whole country should cease to exist, and my own course has been from the close of that contest to do all in my power, in speech and in action, to allay the asperities of the conflict and to secure a return of fraternal good will and link the destinies of the people of the South with those of the people of the North for the future, in the hope of maintaining civil liberty and in the hope of promoting their welfare and prosperity, accepting the dire calamities which fell upon them, such as have seldom been visited upon a people in any part of the world. Whether it was welcome to them or not, it was inevitable, and their hope and their desire has been to do nothing which could stimulate passion or prejudice against them, but to do everything that reasonably and honorably they might do to secure the kindly feeling and fraternal good will of the people of other States with whom they are politically associated.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I am aware that this debate is prolonging itself, but after the extraordinary loquacity which characterized the debate upon the fisheries treaty I think I may be justified in asking a moment to reply to the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that he may proceed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLAIR. In fact, Mr. President, I have thought that the debate upon the school bill, about which so many Senators have said so much, which was characterized on account of its length so freely, might well be adopted as a model of brevity for the imitation of the Senate in all time.

Whenever the leaders of the Democracy are pressed in earnest, they immediately fall back upon the pitiable condition, as they describe it, in which the Southern people were left by the war, and the suffering and wrongs and injuries which they endured in its progress, and they seldom fail, as the Senator from Texas did not fail, to charge the existence of the institution of slavery to the Northern people and to claim that they only acted in the great controversy which preceded the war in the most judicious way for the proper management of the institution. The responsibility was upon the money-getters of the North, old England insisted on forcing it upon them, and perhaps some other mercenary and piratical nations across the water!

If the Senator had read my speeches on the school bill, he would have known that I sympathize more than I ought to, perhaps, somewhat more than my associates on the Republican side of the Chamber have always justified in their view of the subject. I have a belief that the Southern people to a great extent were victims of the institution of slavery; but I never believed and I never said, and I do not think the Senator himself will undertake to say, that they were not willing and anxious and affirmatively victims.

The Senator must remember that the national Constitution, early in its original provisions, made the way open, in fact effective, by provisions to take effect in the future for the abolition of the slave trade. The Senator knows that the South was not for the adoption of that provision, and he knows, too, that that provision was placed in the Constitution and made operative twenty years in the future, because there was a pecuniary interest in the North that, relying on the market of the South, would have been likely to oppose the ratification of the Constitution had the provision been made operative to take effect immediately, and it was postponed twenty years for that reason alone, because of that comparatively small pecuniary interest at the North invested in the slave trade which it was thought, in the extreme nicety of the balance in several of the States between Constitution and no Constitution, might be able to turn the balance in one or two States, and result in the rejection of the Constitution itself.

But the body of the support for the institution of slavery and for the slave trade was then at the South. This provision was adopted because taking effect in the future it did not seriously injure the pecuniary interests of those engaged in the slave trade at that time, and there was the general hope among the patriots of the South as well as of the North that the influence of republican institutions would result in the gradual elimination, without violence, of this accursed institution from the entire land. There was that hope, but the cotton-gin was invented and the greed of gain took possession of the Southern mind.

The Northern Yankee is not the only human being in whom the instinct for money-making is strong. The love of gain took possession of the Southern mind, and stimulated by it the Southern mind fastened upon this wicked institution, determined to make it permanent; and so it became permanent, and as this nation could not continue to be half slave and half free, and they understood this great truth that we must ultimately be either a slave country or a free country, they made war aggressively upon the Territories and the institutions of the North everywhere and in favor of the extension of slavery.

I am not as old as the Senator, and I doubt whether my memory is any better, but yet I think I can remember when the owners of slaves at the South were demanding the constitutional right that they should take their slaves into every State in the North, to say nothing of the Territories, and they demanded as a constitutional right that they could carry the institution of slavery and locate it permanently in every Territory belonging to the national domain, as well north of the line of compromise as south of it.

The Senator should go a little further back in his reading of history. He should not confine his recollection of history to the so recent past. He should remember the compromise of 1820 as well as that of 1850 and the war, and if he will go back that far he will remember and acknowledge that the controversy settled in 1820 was the great controversy whether slavery should go north of the line of 36° 30′, indefinitely north, indefinitely west, and was not confined to the locality of Kansas, where it became an earnest and a burning question in 1854.

But the Senator seems to think it will not do to spend time in arguing historical questions. The Senator seems to think that I am one of those cold-blooded haters of the South. Why, Mr. President, I believe that many of the friends, the truest friends of the South, live north of the old line of division between the free and the slave States; and for one, if I know myself, while my sympathies are not with the Senator from Texas or such as he, my sympathies are with the great mass of the Southern people, white as well as black, and more with the white than with the black. The difficulty with the Senator is, that expurgating from this debate everything down to the period of reconstruction, he ignores the fact that the whole policy of the Republican party so far as it has related to the South has been to reach, to benefit, and to elevate the masses of the people, and their great effort has been directed not to the colored man alone but to the white man as well, the mud-sill of the South, the mud-socked Democracy of the South, against whom the Senator fights, in alliance with the silk-stocking Democracy of the North and the whole leadership south of Mason and Dixon's line.

When we come to the school bill the enlightened men of the South are for the school bill, and they are with the Republican party in regard to the school bill, because they know that is the true interest of the South. These enlightened men, these strong men of the South, many of them on this floor, know it is no use to fight against the stars of God. They know that revolutions never go backward, and that the last war decided that every man in America, every individual man, the mud-stocking Democrat, the poor white of the South, as well as the mud-sill of the North, and the negro as well, every one of them, shall have that dignity, that position, that equality, that freedom which is proclaimed to be his right by the Declaration of Independence, written by the finger of God, who inspired Jefferson, the man who trembled for his country on account of slavery when he remembered that God was just.

That great and holy declaration shall finally become a realized thing to every American citizen South as well as North. That is the policy of the Republican party, and the fault I find with the Senator is that he ranks himself with those who have turned their backs upon the coming time, who are making progress back to old chaos, to dark night, to the Darwinian origin of the race, and if they have their own way and can progress successfully according to their own policy, they will reach that condition when Senators on this floor, it may be, will see the time that in their demonstrations they will remind us of the accuracy of Artemus Ward's description of his monkey, which I do not need to quote.

These men fight progress, and that is the fault I find with them. When the North undertakes to enact a measure which reaches the common people, which gives to every individual that power and independence which knowledge only can give, so that the man knows enough to defend his right at the ballot-box, knows enough to defend his principles on the hustings, knows enough to make his way to the Senate of the United States and to confront the distinguished Representatives and Senators in argument and debate—I say that when the Republican party has advocated that policy, the Senator from Texas opposes it and makes harangues against the citizenship and the institutions and the motives of the Republican party of the North.

I call you to witness, Mr. President, that there has been no sectional debate started in this Chamber during this Congress by any Republican whatever. If there has been a sectional debate started or suggested from the Republican side of this Chamber I have not observed it; but if I am wrong in saying that no such debate has been originated by a suggestion from this side, let somebody correct me who remembers it.

No; invariably the Senator from Texas or some other Senator gets up and in cold blood delivers himself of an impetuous and, as I have sometimes thought, an insulting harangue against the laboring people and the masses of the people of the North, and complains of our institutions, of our aggressiveness upon their rights. They insult us oftener than they think, it seems to me, not perhaps intentionally, but it has so seemed to me as I have sat here.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BLAIR. I am not impeaching motives.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the Senator if he means to impute to me what he is now saying, and if he does, what single instance can he give to justify his remark?

Mr. BLAIR. As to insulting the people of the North, I did not say anything of that kind.

Mr. REAGAN. As to making war upon the laboring people of the North?

Mr. BLAIR. I appeal to the Senator's speeches here to-day. I appeal to his record every time almost that he has spoken during this session. I appeal to the record he made the other day, in the speech in which he quoted with such zeal and such apparent pleasure the few remarks by Mr. Blaine. That is the speech to which I have special reference.

Mr. REAGAN. If the Senator will produce my record to that effect I shall accept his statement; but I trust he will not put any gloss upon it.

Mr. BLAIR. I was not trying to gloss it. I will not put any more gloss upon it. I restrained myself a little, but I did not think I was glossing the record. But, Mr. President, the rules of the Senate have put a gloss upon it. I leave it there. So far as attacking the institutions of the people of the North is concerned, I do not undertake to say that the Senator is conscious of it. It may be something of the old-time training which survives and affects men, and which they can not eradicate from their mental processes.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator will allow me to state that I have never said one word (and he can not produce it and no man can produce it) against the people of the North. I have arraigned the Republican party, but they are not the people of the North; they are only a part of the people of the North.

Mr. BLAIR. The Republican party are the vast majority of the people of the North. They are the people who built up the institutions of the North, who dictated the policy of the North, who established the protective tariff, who established the principles of liberty, first at home and then carried them when forced to do it by arms to the South, and along with arms and force the common schools of the North and the carpet-bag governments, which do not fail to be assailed with virulence—not with falsehood, but misrepresentation and virulence almost every time that affairs between the North and South are alluded to here on this floor.

The common schools of the South were first written into the constitutions under which they now live and prosper by the carpet-bag governments which were established through Northern agency.

Senators would do well to stop and think whether there be any feelings, any susceptibilities north of Mason and Dixon's line, whether we are equals in this Chamber, or whether we are to be treated to the crack of doom with comments which continually assail, and if they do not insult do worse than that, the motives of the people of the North, by which I mean the Republican party of the North; and the remaining portion of the people of the North are identified with the institutions and with the policies of the Republican party of the North, so that whatever of prosperity and happiness there is among that people is to be attributed to that political policy and those institutions.

If the Democratic party has prospered at the North, if there are great industries and great wealth, if there are millionaires, if there is a general prevalence of comfort and prosperity among the Northern people, it is because of Republican policies; and if we can maintain them, not only will that status continue at the North, but it will come ultimately to prevail all over the South.

I have one other suggestion to make. If the Senator does not wish us to make allusion to the war and to the cost it brought on the country, why is it that he is continually alluding to and parading before us the consequences of the war, the debts which resulted from the necessity of the great struggle in which we were engaged in order to maintain the unity of the Government? The Senator will hardly claim that the indebtedness of the country is not a result of the war.

Mr. REAGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that I have stated distinctly that the formation of the debt grew out of policies perhaps the best that the Government could adopt. I never made any accusation, complaint, or arraignment about the creation of the debt. My words were as to the method of paying the debt by discriminations against labor and in favor of capital.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator would have done better to have thought in regard to the methods and causes which led to the contraction of the debt, and to have thought of that in season. He seems to labor, like other friends of his in debate, under the delusion that they are to limit the topics to be suggested on this floor by whatsoever is pleasant to them to discuss, and so they take up this comparatively infinitesimal consideration of the pecuniary obligation which resulted from the war. The important things involved in the war were human rights, the perpetuity of this Union, the lasting of the American nation. Those were the essential things. The war cost some money, and the Senator is continually harping upon the topic of the debt and the methods of paying the debt; and yet when we go a little further back into the history of parties and charge upon the Democratic party the contraction of the debt and things a thousand times worse, he does not want to hear anything about it.

Now, Mr. President, let me close by saying to the Senator that I appreciate his high character, and I should compliment him as he did myself, and with vastly greater truth, if the lexicon furnished me with terms in which to do it; but I complain of the Senator that when we come to him and to his friends in the South with measures which would produce homogeneous conditions throughout this entire country, which would give to the poor man the opportunity to be poor in peace and the opportunity to rise in his position if he has that in him which may stimulate him to do it, the opportunity to seek the same general elevation all over this country, the knowledge which gives the power, so that he can defend his ballot and defend his right—when we come with that policy and with institutions which must inevitably have that result at the South as at the North, he turns his back upon it and opposes it with all of rhetoric and of ability that he possesses.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the regular order, being the Washington Territory bill, has been temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the Chinese bill. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who took the floor yesterday evening upon that bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the second committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, still further insisted upon its disagreement to the thirty-second, thirty-third, and thirty-fifth amendments of the Senate to the said bill, asked a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. TOWNSHEND, Mr. MAISH, and Mr. SAYERS managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 832) to provide an additional mode of taking depositions of witnesses in causes pending in the courts of the United States, with an amendment, asked a conference with the Senate on the said bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. OATES, Mr. CULBERSON, and Mr. CASWELL, managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3234) to abolish circuit-court powers of certain district courts of the United States, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9447) to restore certain money to the fund for erecting a public building at the city of Detroit; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 8310) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Wallace military reservation in Kansas; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

DISTRICT ELECTRIC WIRES.

Mr. FARWELL. I ask the Senator from Colorado to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. TELLER. I will yield if it is not anything that will bring up a discussion.

Mr. FARWELL. I ask the Senate to consider the resolution reported by me yesterday from the Committee on the District of Columbia, which is Order of Business 2206.

Mr. TELLER. I reserve the right to call for the regular order if it should occasion debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] asks the Senate to consider the resolution instructing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to revoke any permit granted for the erection of overhead electric wires; which was reported adversely yesterday from the Committee on the District of Columbia. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. TELLER. I object, because the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who has taken special interest in the matter, is not here, and I am sure that the resolution will give rise to debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado objects.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator from Colorado would allow me to observe that these people have a contract under which they will lose, as I am told, very considerably, unless they are permitted to accept it by the 15th of September, which is their obligation. I do not insist on taking up the resolution at this moment, but I wish to point out to the Senator that it will not be fair to insist on delaying it until the return of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] next Monday, which will reach almost to the 15th of September, when the matter has been thoroughly heard and unanimously reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia. I do not ask to take it up now, but I do not think it should be delayed until the Senator from Vermont comes back.

Mr. TELLER. I shall not insist on its being delayed until that time, but I am very confident that there are other Senators who propose to be heard on the subject. As far as I am concerned I am opposed to the resolution, and I am willing to take it up at any time when it will not displace the Chinese bill.

Mr. FARWELL. I wish to say that the committee had the matter under investigation, received testimony upon it, and directed me unanimously to report against the resolution. There was not a dissenting voice in the committee.

Mr. TELLER. I shall not object to it when it comes up some other time.

Mr. FARWELL. I give notice that I shall call up the resolution to-morrow.

Mr. TELLER. I shall not object at any time after we get through with the Chinese bill.

RECONSIDERATION OF LIGHT-HOUSE BILLS.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Colorado yield so that I may make a motion to reconsider the votes by which several bills were passed?

Mr. TELLER. I will yield for any purpose of that kind.

Mr. PALMER. Yesterday there were several light-house bills passed by the Senate which I find are included in the sundry civil appropriation bill as agreed to in conference. On that account I ask that the votes by which the bills were passed may be reconsidered and the bills indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator give the numbers of the bills?

Mr. PALMER. I will give them seriatim. The first is the bill (H. R. 1228) for establishing light or lights and a fog-signal at or near Ballast Point, entrance to San Diego Bay, California. I move to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. PALMER. I now move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PALMER. I move to reconsider the votes by which the bill (H. R. 8750) for the establishment of a light-house at or near Tangier Island, Chesapeake Bay, was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be indefinitely postponed if there be no objection.

Mr. PALMER. I move to reconsider the votes by which the bill (H. R. 1912) for the establishment of a light-house at the mouth of Great Wicomico River, Virginia, was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be indefinitely postponed unless objection is heard.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11336) a supplement to an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved the 6th day of May, 1882.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I expressed my satisfaction yesterday that this bill had come to us for the purpose of modifying or abrogating to some extent the treaty made in 1880 with the Government of China.

Before I proceed I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to the distinction between a violation of a treaty and its abrogation. The violation of a treaty carries with it the idea of misconduct; that is to say, if the Government of the United States has made a treaty with China, and the Government of the United States declines to carry it out without having abrogated it, that is a violation of the treaty. Every nation in the world when it makes a treaty with another nation reserves to itself without words the right, whenever it shall be considered necessary in the interest of the people of that country, to abrogate the treaty.

The distinction between the abrogation and the violation of a treaty is not one merely of words, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] seemed yesterday to claim. When a treaty is abrogated by legislative action it ceases to be a treaty; it is gone, and then conduct would be perfectly proper for the Government which would be improper before.

A treaty in this country can only be displaced or repealed or modified or abrogated by the legislative department of the Government. So, if the President of the United States should say "I decline to allow these people having certificates to land at the port of San Francisco" without any action of the legislative branch of the Government, without any modification of the treaty through the Executive and the Senate, that would be a violation of the treaty; but when he shall say that, as he will say it after we have passed this proposed act, it will be no violation of the treaty, because the treaty will have gone, and gone in the way that we had a right to have it go, by legislative action.

Therefore I insist that the term "violating a treaty" is not the proper term to be applied here. I have had occasion to discuss that question once or twice, and I think nearly ten years ago I discussed it in the Senate. While I would not violate a treaty, while I would not countenance the violation of a treaty, I would abrogate any and every treaty when in my judgment as a member of the legislative department of the Government it is in the interest of the great masses of the people of the United States so to do.

You may abrogate a treaty in such a way as to get into difficulty, and so sometimes it is not policy to abrogate a treaty. The nation with which you are dealing may take offense. It may be that the character of the treaty is such that good faith requires that you should give notice to the other nation that you propose to abrogate it. But the right to abrogate it has never been denied by any law-writer that I am aware of. I never heard it but once seriously denied in the Senate, and then by a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who, I believe, finally corrected himself on that subject, and he sits on the other side of the Chamber.

The question of the influx of Chinese labor into the United States is not a new question. I agree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who said yesterday that it was practically to-day a settled question. It is scarcely a burning question at this day, for we have declared our intention to prevent the general influx of Chinese. We have asserted our right to do so. We have modified the treaties in order that we might do it. I think whatever might have been the opinion ten years or twenty years ago, to-day it is the general opinion of the people of the United States that Chinese immigration should be prohibited.

So I am not going into a general discussion as to whether Chinese immigration ought to be prohibited. At all events the people have come to that conclusion. In 1878 the House of Representatives sent to this body a bill to prohibit, limit, and restrict Chinese immigration, prohibiting it in part, curtailing it, and providing certain restrictions. That bill was antagonized in this body with rare exceptions only. I admit that a few Senators in this body said that it was a denial of a right which they insisted belonged to all men. They were right in the general declaration, but wrong in its application. A few said that. I was a member of the body at the time and I can not be mistaken, because it was a matter of interest to me then as it is now and has been for many years. The great objection was then that the bill was not in accordance with the provisions of the treaty of 1868, the Burlingame treaty, which I will say, aside from the declaration which is contained in the fifth section of it, was not different from the treaty of 1844 or the treaty of 1858, negotiated by Democratic administrations and ratified by a Democratic Senate.

What was the distinction between the treaty of 1868 and the treaties of 1844 and 1858? Simply that we asserted that which has ever been the doctrine of republican nations—I do not speak of it as politics; I speak of it in the sense that we are a republican nation—the right of every man who saw fit so to do to flee from oppression and to go to any other country that was willing to open its doors to him. That was the position which we declared in 1868 in the Burlingame treaty. Does any man sitting on that side of the Chamber deny it? I wait to hear any Senator, the Senator from Mississippi included, rise and say that he denies the correctness of that doctrine laid down in the Burlingame treaty. It was the doctrine upon which Mr. Webster wrote his great letter which settled that question all over the world. It is the doctrine we have crystallized into treaties and statutes, that every man who sees fit to flee from the land of his birth has a right so to do, and can transfer his allegiance, with the consent only and always of the country to which he flees, what should be his condition when he got there being determined always by the law of the land where he went and not by the law of the land from which he came. It was that which enabled us to say to the European countries when our citizens went back to Europe, to Germany, to France, and to Great Britain, "These men have by a natural right severed their connection with you and transferred their allegiance to us." There are nine and a half million of men in the United States who have come here within twenty years asserting that right, and we have asserted it, and we have been ready to go to war at all times in defense of it. Yet sneeringly the Senator from Mississippi tells us that this was opening the door to Chinese immigration.

Mr. President, that was all there was of the treaty of 1868. I repeat, will any man on that side of the Chamber stand up and say he is opposed to that doctrine? If he is, then when an Irishman goes back to Great Britain, Great Britain can put him in prison for leaving the country if it sees fit, and the German who flees from Germany that he may escape the three years' service in the German army may when he goes back be put into the army; and so with the Frenchman. It has been the prized jewel in the American crown; it has been the thing we have boasted of and glorified ourselves for, as we have for no other single principle; and yet the Senator says that simply an assertion in a treaty compelling China to admit that which she had denied for years was opening the door to Chinese immigration!

The Senator said another thing that I wish to notice. I think when the Senator looks over his remarks, when he thinks of the application that can be made of them, he will take the liberty, which every Senator ought to have, to correct himself on that subject. The Senator said that Chinese immigration arose out of the treaty of 1868. He is not familiar with the subject. He should have come to some of us who have had some acquaintance with the subject for facts. I say without egotism we should be able to give him instruction in these questions.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] showed him that when that treaty was made there were more Chinese in the United States than there are in the country to-day. Years before that treaty was made we had seen them in camps on the Pacific coast by the thousands. I saw myself 4,000 in one camp years before that treaty was made. They came here under treaties made by Democratic administrations, ratified by a Democratic Senate; and the Senator would now have the country understand that the Republican party have invited the Chinese to this country! The Senator is only excusable on the ground that this has not been a question of importance to his people and his section, and therefore he has not studied it and has not read the history of this Asiatic immigration.

In 1844 we made the first treaty with China. It was regarded as a great achievement. We were the first nation to break down the wall that had hedged around that great people for four thousand years. We were the first people, young as we were, to compel them to open their ports to our commerce. Other nations followed.

In 1858 we repeated the treaty of 1844 in substance, with some changes. In those treaties was there any provision that Chinamen should not come to the United States? There was not any assertion at that time of the doctrine that a man has a right to change his allegiance and his home, but the Democratic administrations who negotiated those treaties were ready then, as all administrations have been ready, to go to war in favor of that doctrine, and if China would have then consented to its insertion in a treaty they would have been able to have inserted it. China would not agree to it then. It was only later when light reached them that they were willing to make that change.

Mr. President, I blame nobody that there was no provision made in 1844 or in 1858 that the Chinese should not come to this country, because up to that time outside of California no attention whatever had been attracted to Chinese immigration. Nobody had supposed that danger lurked in it. On the contrary, it was early supposed by nearly all classes of men that there was a benefit to be derived from this immigration. So the Senator from Mississippi can throw no sticks at this side of the Chamber, nor can he throw any sticks at the Republican party on this question. If, when questions of this character came here, some of the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber were more careful of the plighted faith of the Government than others, it was because they did not see the great danger there was in Chinese immigration.

Mr. President, I yield to no man living in a desire that when the Government of the United States makes a contract with a foreign nation of any kind it shall adhere to that contract until it is properly and with the consent of the other party, if possible, changed; but I knew the great need and the great necessity of legislation upon this subject, and I was willing in 1878, as I have been willing for many years, to do what I think we have a legal and a proper right to do—abrogate by legislative action a treaty that was bearing hard upon the people and a treaty that was liable in the course of time to work great injury not only to the people of California and the Pacific coast but to all the country. I did not put it here on the floor nor have I put it anywhere solely upon the ground that it was the introduction of cheap labor. I put it upon a higher ground, that it brought American labor in contact with degraded labor and thus degraded American labor.

The act passed in 1879 (perhaps it may have been in 1878; I have not looked it up; but the act was passed during Mr. Hayes's administration) was vetoed for the reason I have stated, and for that reason only. Thereupon the Republican administration made haste to see that the treaty was so modified that we could without any trouble, without apparently violating our good faith, exclude these people from our midst. When it came here I was still a member of this body. I voted every time, although the Senator from Mississippi said once it appeared I had not voted. I voted or was paired every time in favor of the exclusion of Chinese. Upon that question I have never occupied two sides, either before I came into public life or since. I have not taken this position simply because the Chinese were overwhelming my State or my section, for I believe there have never been over five hundred or six hundred Chinamen in Colorado at any time, but I had seen the evil influence on other sections of the country and knew whereof I spoke.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] the other day arraigned the Republican candidate for the Presidency upon the ground that he had been in favor of Chinese immigration. He was unable to find a single jot or a single tittle in the discussion anywhere which indicated that Mr. Harrison was opposed to the restriction of Chinese immigration. Mr. Harrison was opposed to saying that for twenty years Chinese should be excluded. Why? Because he believed it was not consistent with the treaty of 1880, and very many men on this floor believed the same thing. I so believed; and when the present occupant of the chair [Mr. INGALLS] moved an amendment that the term should be put at ten years—I had made some remarks upon the subject at another time to the effect that I was opposed to Chinese immigration, and that I did not think twenty years was too long to exclude them—I rose and said: "I want to exclude them forever, but Senators on this floor say that they do not think that it is consistent with the treaty, and as I am anxious for the passage of this bill I will vote for ten years." So I voted for the ten years, as did many others, and among those was the present candidate of the Republican party for the Presidency.

The Senator from Missouri said in his remarks the other day that every man who voted for that modification (which was not accepted and did not become a part of the law) voted that after ten years he was in favor of unrestricted Chinese immigration. No more monstrous assertion could be made, for no man on the floor had been more anxious than I was for the exclusion of the Chinese, as I had expressed in my speeches and by my votes. The Senator's own colleague voted for that amendment, as did the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], undoubtedly moved by the same reason that moved me. Anxious to secure the passage of the bill, anxious to have some legislation which would accomplish this purpose, we were willing to make the bill acceptable to those who were then opposed to it, and if we had made it so acceptable we should have avoided the subsequent veto.

But when the Senate voted down that proposition, I voted for the bill with its provision of twenty years, and when the President sent it back I voted to pass it over his veto, although I had already then been nominated and confirmed by the Senate as a member of his Cabinet.

Six weeks later the Senator from Missouri voted for that very provision himself in the new bill that came in, which ultimately received the indorsement of the President, and which was identical in terms save and except that it limited the period to ten years instead of twenty years. If men who voted for the first bill thereby declared they were in favor of unrestricted Chinese immigration after twenty years, then so did the Senator from Missouri and so did all who voted in that way declare.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to interrupt him for a minute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. TELLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Colorado has alluded to some criticism or supposed criticism of mine upon his voting. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to a remark in my speech in which I separated him from the opposing Senators and acknowledged fully and freely that he was on the side of the Chinese question in all these matters that I was. I desired to call his attention to that fact.

Mr. TELLER. I did not understand the Senator to criticise me, but I understood the Senator to read from a paper, and not to read from the record, in which it appeared that I did not vote.

Mr. GEORGE. On one occasion.

Mr. TELLER. There was one vote on which I was paired which the speech he read from, which had been delivered in the other House, did not show.

Mr. GEORGE. I am sorry if my reading from that record did any injustice to the Senator. It was very carefully prepared.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say that upon this subject I do not yield in zeal to anybody on earth, and I have had these ideas longer than the Senator from Mississippi. I had them years ago. It is no new faith with me; and on this question the Republican Presidential candidate voted just exactly as I voted. I believe that he is as sound on the question of American labor, whether it be of protecting it against the pauper labor of Europe or the pauper labor of China, as any man in the world.

The bill finally came here and was passed and was signed by President Arthur. I wish to say that all the efforts which have been made that have eventuated in any measure worth anything to the people on this question have come from Republicans and have had the sanction of a Republican Senate and a Republican President.

So it will not do for the Senator from Mississippi to assume that the Democrats have been in favor of the restriction of Chinese immigration or its prohibition while they have been the other way. In 1876 at Cincinnati at our national convention we put in a provision on the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] that Congress should investigate this subject with reference to legislation upon it. That was just what the Pacific coast people asked and all they asked. In 1880 we put in our platform this provision, which I will read:

Since the authority to regulate immigration and intercourse between the United States and foreign nations rests with Congress, or with the United States and its treaty-making power, the Republican party, regarding the unrestricted immigration of the Chinese as an evil of great magnitude, invokes the exercise of those powers to restrain and limit that immigration by the enactment of such just, humane, and reasonable provisions as will produce that result.

Who wants anything more than that? It was satisfactory to the people on the Western coast, as it was satisfactory to the people everywhere who have studied this question and who have had a special and direct interest in it.

But in 1880, just before the campaign closed, there appeared in a New York paper the letter known as the Morey letter. I will read the letter. It was as follows:

[Personal and confidential.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, D. C., January 23, 1880.

DEAR SIR: Yours in relation to the Chinese problem came duly to hand.

I take it that the question of employés is only a question of private and corporate economy, and individuals and companies have the right to buy labor where they can get it cheapest.

We have a treaty with the Chinese Government which should be religiously kept until its provisions are abrogated by the action of the General Government, and I am not prepared to say that it should be abrogated until our great manufacturing and corporate interests are conserved in the matter of labor.

Very truly, yours,

J. A. GARFIELD.

H. L. MOREY,
Employers' Union, Lynn, Mass.

When that was published the then candidate for the Presidency, Mr. Garfield, made haste to deny that he had ever written such a letter. All the Democratic press throughout the country asserted that he had written the letter. High and responsible Democratic authority was invoked as to the signature of the letter.

Mr. PLATT. It was lithographed.

Mr. TELLER. The lithographed letter was sent out. It was a forgery of the basest kind, subsequently proved in court to have been a forgery, and what was more, it was a clumsy forgery. It was a forgery that ought not to have deceived anybody, and it would not have deceived anybody if there had not been a desire to misrepresent the attitude of the Republican candidate for the Presidency.

The Morey letter did not succeed, and this attack upon the present Republican candidate will not succeed now. Why? Because the people know it is not true. If that letter had been known by the people of the United States to have been the actual letter of James A. Garfield, I venture to say, as I have said before on this floor, that he would not have carried a State in this Union—not one—and he ought not to have carried a State in the Union if he had written a letter of that kind, or if he had declared sentiments of that character—a declaration that the great manufacturing and corporate authorities had a right, at the expense of the laboring people of the country, to get their labor wherever they could.

But in this Congress, on the other side of this Capitol, in another body, the same sentiment has been uttered and declared which was contained in the Morey letter. A member of Congress declared recently, and the utterances have been published broadcast, that it was our right to buy goods wherever we could buy cheapest, and when asked if that applied to labor he declared that it did. That was the utterance of a Democratic member, and no Democrat to this hour, either there or here, has risen to rebuke him for the logical statement that he made if his first proposition was true.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Senator tell us whether, during the twenty-odd years that his party held power in this country, it ever put upon the statute-books, or ever proposed a law that would prevent a manufacturer or a miner from buying the pauper labor of Europe and bringing it into this country, tax-free, if he wanted to do so?

Mr. TELLER. I will tell the Senator all about that before I get through, and I will also say before I get through something about the claim made by the other side of this Chamber that they are the patrons of labor. I shall have time, I think, to allude to some things in their history within the memory of men, and if they want to discuss that question for twenty years past I shall be quite prepared to discuss it with the Senator or anybody else on that side. If there ever was a fraud on the American people it is when that side of the Chamber talk about their fealty to labor and their interest for the laboring men. I challenge them now here to show in the long years that they had the Government, and they may take their time to look it up, one single statute of commanding importance in the interest of labor. They can not show one. And I will show them that whenever any great question in the interest of human rights came up they were always against it. We will compare records, Mr. President, the Democratic party and the Republican party, either before the war or since.

It was forgery that they used in 1880; it is slander that they hope to use in 1888 to get themselves into power. It will not be amiss now, sir, to look into the history of the Democratic party on this question of Chinese labor.

California was the first section to be cursed with Chinese labor. The Senator who sits by my side [Mr. MITCHELL] last night told us something about it. He told us of a Democratic governor who afterward came and sat in this Chamber——

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will pardon me, I desire to say that I was mistaken in regard to that matter. The man, John McDougall, who was governor of California, was not the Mr. McDougall who was afterwards Senator. He was governor of California, however, and was a Democrat.

Mr. TELLER. Well, I did not know about that. I supposed that the person of that name who subsequently came here was the same man; but it does not make any difference whether he sat in this Chamber or not, he declared, as the Senator from Oregon read yesterday, that Chinese laborers were desirable and valuable and most favored, or should be most favored, of all our immigrants.

At the risk of repeating what the Senator from Oregon said so well yesterday, I will go over this ground a little. I will first call attention, for fear I may forget it, to the great number of Chinamen that had come in on the Pacific coast as early as 1850, 1851, 1852, and subsequent thereto. I want to read a little of the record of the Democratic party in California, for that is the only place in which any record was made on this question at that time.

In March, 1852, Mr. Peachy, a Democratic member of the California Legislature, which was a Democratic Legislature, introduced a bill to legalize contracts for labor made in China, which provided that such contracts should be good for five years, and might be made assignable. Any laborer brought in under contract who should attempt to leave his master could be arrested and compelled to work out his contract of service. This was known as the Peachy bill, and passed the lower house. It was supported by Mr. Peachy, its author, and by Mr. Roach and Mr. Hager, all distinguished Democrats. Shortly after this a bill was introduced into the California Legislature for taxing Chinamen. This the Democratic majority refused to pass. Mr. Hager, who was afterward a member of this body, and is now collector of customs at the port of San Francisco, offered the following resolution:

Whereas California is nearer China than any other State and a valuable commerce has been opened up:

Resolved, That a commission be appointed to go to China.

And when an attempt was made to substitute South America for China the Democrats voted it down.

In 1852 a Whig member of the Legislature offered a bill known as the miners' tax, imposing a head-tax on all aliens working mining claims. It was incontinently laid on the table by the Democratic majority of the Legislature. At that time there were 25,000 Chinamen in the State. In 1856 there were 30,000 Chinamen in California. Labor demanded their exclusion. The Democratic Legislature appointed a Democratic committee of inquiry, which made a report on the subject from which I shall read a sentence. Now, mark this, you Senators who insist that you have been par excellence the defenders of labor as against Chinese:

We say the tendency is not towards corruption. They have done us no harm.

In 1859 Mr. Weller, a Democratic governor of California, declared:

We have cause to rejoice that this great nation (China) has been subjected to the law of nations.

The cause of that rejoicing was that there had been a treaty concluded with China the year before, called the treaty of 1858, which did not provide, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] thinks the treaty of 1868 ought to have provided, for the exclusion of Chinese, but allowed them to come.

Now, Mr. President, I want to contrast the Democratic position with the Republican position on that subject. California had been ultra-Democratic. It was controlled by the most Bourbon-like of all Democrats. It was controlled by the class of men then in power in the country, who were managing and controlling the Democratic party, the ultra pro-slavery men of the country. They had filled up California with able men from that section of the country, and while they could not control it sufficiently to establish human slavery as they tried to do, they controlled it sufficiently to get Democratic legislators and governors.

But in 1862, in the midst of the civil war, when the patriotic love of the Western people was stirred, there were enough of them found voting with the Republican party to elect one of their number governor of the State—a gentleman now an honored member of this body, the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD]. I wish to contrast his utterances with the utterances of those Democrats who preceded him, and to show the attitude of the Democratic party that preceded his administration in that State, the only State then that had been called upon to take up this question where public sentiment had been crystallized at all so that it could be said there was a sentiment.

Before reading what Governor Stanford said with regard to the immigration of Chinese, I want to read what he said on another subject; and I read it because the words are words that seem to me as valuable as gold. This, mind you, Mr. President, was in 1862, when there was great trouble in this country and when it was uncertain whether California would be cut off from the rest of the country by secession. He said:

California has nobly and wisely pronounced in favor of the cause of the people. Let her prove her devotion to the cause of the Union and to civil liberty by doing all in her power to maintain both. Let her part of the national tax be cheerfully assumed, and provision be made for its payment out of the State treasury. Every one of us should feel that we are but guardians, holding our lives and our fortunes in trust for the protection of the Government, around which cluster the anxious hopes and fears of millions who have grown with its growth and strengthened with its strength.

Our Government is emphatically one of the people, possessing all the power of the people for their protection and defense, but powerless for their oppression. It is not only the best, but the strongest form of government the world has ever known. Let it remain unchanged.

Those are patriotic words, Mr. President, full of meaning, full of truth. In a government of the people there should be no oppression of the people. It is not strange that he who entertained that sentiment, when he saw these hordes from Asia competing with American labor and doing what I repeat again is a hundred times worse, degrading American labor by their association, pulling it down from the high position that it had occupied here as nowhere else in the world—it is not strange that he should have turned his attention to getting rid of these people. Now hear what he said:

While the settlement of our State is of the first importance—

This is the governor's inaugural message. This is when he first addressed the people of the State that had honored him with election. Mind you, Mr. President, this is from the first Republican governor of California, elected in 1862—Governor Leland Stanford. He said:

While the settlement of our State is of the first importance, the character of those who shall become settlers is worthy of scarcely less consideration. To my mind it is clear that the settlement among us of an inferior race is to be discouraged by every legitimate means. Asia, with her numberless millions, sends to our shores the dregs of her population. Large numbers of this class are already here, and unless we do something early to check their immigration the question which of the two tides of immigration meeting upon the shores of the Pacific shall be turned back will be forced upon our consideration when far more difficult than now of disposal. There can be no doubt but that the presence of numbers among us of a degraded and distinct people must exercise a deleterious influence upon the superior race and to a certain extent repel desirable immigration. It will afford me great pleasure to concur with the Legislature in any constitutional action having for its object the repression of the immigration of the Asiatic races.

That, Mr. President, was the first official utterance from any public man anywhere against Chinese immigation. While there had been protests in California and protests in other sections, the protestants had not been in power; but as soon as the Republicans came into control in California that was what the Republican governor said. Of course it was a question beyond their control; of course it was a question for national authority and the exercise of national power; but it showed plainly that the Republican party then, as now, has been opposed to this kind of immigration.

I desire now, Mr. President, to call attention to some other movements that have been made in the interest of the repression of this class of immigrants.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly; I am always glad to answer questions.

Mr. PAYNE. Was not Governor Stanford at that time connected with the Union or Central Pacific Railroad officially and as a large stockholder?

Mr. TELLER. What was the question?

Mr. PAYNE. I asked whether Governor Stanford was not at the time referred to connected with the Union or Central Pacific Railroad officially and as a large stockholder.

Mr. TELLER. Not at that time. The company had not been organized at that time; it had not been formed at that time.

Mr. MITCHELL. The charter was granted in 1862.

Mr. TELLER. As the Senator from Oregon says, the charter of that company was not granted until 1862, and was revivified by act of Congress in 1864, and up to that time there had been no organization of a continental road.

Mr. PAYNE. Let me inquire of the Senator whether the Mongolians who were on the Pacific coast subsequently were not brought there by that company?

Mr. TELLER. No; not by that road nor by any other road. They came there of their own accord. A Republican administration had prevented them before that—prevented the introduction of cooly labor into the United States.

For fear I may forget it, I will answer the Senator from Ohio when he asks whether subsequently these railroads did not import contract labor. Before the war, as early as the year 1852, there was an inquiry by the House of Representatives into the cooly trade. It did not come to anything. The class of men who were in power, who were controlling the administration, were in favor of the cooly trade. It was akin to their system of labor, and you could not have hoped or have expected that in those days anybody who held that the black man ought to be a slave could not hold with equal propriety that the brown man might be a slave also. But on the 19th of February, 1862, when there was a Republican administration in both branches of Congress and a Republican Executive, there was passed this law which has gone into the Revised Statutes, and is now in force:

SEC. 2158. No citizen of the United States, or foreigner coming into or residing within the same, shall, for himself or for any other person, either as master, factor, owner, or otherwise, build, equip, load, or otherwise prepare, any vessel, registered, enrolled, or licensed, in the United States, for the purpose of procuring from any port or place the subjects of China, Japan, or of any other oriental country, known as "coolies," to be transported to any foreign port, or place, to be disposed of, or sold, or transferred, for any time, as servants or apprentices, or to be held to service or labor.

That law, as I have said, was passed on the 19th of February, 1862. There is not a man sitting in this Chamber who came from south of Mason and Dixon's line who would have voted for that bill; none of them would have done so then. They hold different ideas, I trust, now from what they held then.

I will not read the whole statute. It provides penalties, and carefully guards the provision that they shall not be brought. Under that law there was no importation of cooly labor into any section of our country as there had been in some of the Southern States before the war.

A Senator suggests to me that that was advanced ground. It was. It was breaking in upon what had been the opinion of a great many men in this country—the opinion, namely, that there was a right of capitalists to buy labor where they could buy it cheapest. The maxim that they had a right to buy labor where they could buy it cheapest was the corollary and proper logical deduction to that which maintained that you had the right always, irrespective of the interests of the people, to buy goods wherever you could buy them cheapest. If the one is sound doctrine the other is sound doctrine. At that time everywhere in this country where the doctrine of free trade was rampant so was the other doctrine, involving the right to buy labor as to buy goods.

When this legislation was passed it was supposed it would preclude or hinder the coming of great bodies of these people, who it was believed were contracted for by their own countrymen in many instances, and undoubtedly were. It did not have that result.

I want to go a little further in showing up the record on this question. In 1869, when labor in California was distressed, there was pending before the Democratic Legislature of the State a bill granting a large body of tide lands to a railroad corporation. To this an amendment was offered prohibiting the employment of Chinese by the beneficiary. Of the 42 votes recorded against this amendment 32 were cast by Democrats.

On the 4th of December, 1861, Thomas D. Elliott, of Massachusetts, a Republican Representative in Congress, offered a bill prohibiting the importation of coolies into the United States. It passed both Houses and was approved by Abraham Lincoln, and that is the bill I have read.

In 1877 Mr. STEWART, of Nevada, secured the passage of a resolution calling for further information as to this traffic. Mr. Sargent, of California, in the same year also offered a bill in the House of Representatives on the subject. In 1873 Mr. Page, of California, offered a bill prohibiting the importation of Chinese coolies and prostitutes, which passed in the House in 1875. In 1874 General Grant called attention to the same question, in these words:

I call the attention of Congress to a generally conceded fact, that the greater proportion of Chinese immigrants * * * do not come voluntarily * * * but come under contracts with head-men, who own them almost absolutely. In a worse form does this apply to Chinese women. * * * If this evil practice can be legislated against, it will be my pleasure as well as duty to enforce any regulations to secure so desirable an end.

In 1874 and 1875 Mr. Sargent and Mr. Page were both active in so curing legislation on this subject and were both Republicans. Up to that time I have to find yet that any Democrat had taken any steps in this direction at all. Now we are up to 1870, and the Democratic record in California, the only State to which Chinamen had come, showed that the Democrats were opposed to its restriction.

Now I come to my own State, the State of Colorado.

In the twenty-seven years that Colorado has been an organized Territory or State she has had only once a Democratic Legislature. In 1870 the Democrats had not only the Territorial council by a very respectable majority but also the house of representatives of the Territory by an equally respectable majority. Both bodies were small. In the house of representatives there were twenty-six members, and of those sixteen were Democrats. In the council there were thirteen members, and of those nine were Democrats. So there was a Democratic working majority in both bodies. There was a Democratic speaker of the house and a Democratic president of the council, and there was a Republican governor. For fear I may forget it I wish to say now that that Republican governor has been training for a good many years in the ranks of the Democratic party, and is to-day a Democratic official under this Administration.

Let us see now what the Democratic Legislature in Colorado did on this question as late as February, 1870. I have here the legislative proceedings of the Territory of Colorado and I find this:

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION.

For the encouragement of Chinese immigration into Colorado Territory.

Resolved by the house of representatives of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Colorado, the council concurring, That immigration of Chinese labor to Colorado is eminently calculated to hasten the development and early prosperity of the Territory by supplying the demands for cheap labor.

Resolved, That such immigration should be encouraged by such legislation as will guaranty to said immigration security in their persons and property.

Approved February 11, A. D. 1870.

I have been to the trouble to find out, by looking up the journal, who introduced that, and I find that it was a prominent Democrat of the house of representatives who introduced it, a Mr. Bevan, representing one of our mining districts at that time and another time in the Legislature.

Now, what a degree of effrontery is required for the Senator from Mississippi to stand up here, in view of the record I have read, in the only section of the country where a record could be made on this question at all, and tell us that we have been the party of Chinese labor, that we have been in favor of it, when we are the only people that have ever made an effort to secure the exclusion of Chinese. Why, we have had a Democratic House of Representatives here since 1875, and what have they done towards securing the exclusion of the Chinese? For two years of that time the Democrats had both the House and Senate. What did they do then? That is the time they passed the bill. Was it a party measure? When that was before the Senate the present Secretary of State declared that the bill ought to conform to and be in unison with the treaty, that it ought to be shaped upon the treaty. I do not remember whether he voted for it or not, but he certainly made that declaration, and declared that he would vote for the Ingalls amendment, although I believe he did not.

I now call the attention of the Senate to another thing in connection with this question. In 1864 we passed what was called the contract-labor law. The other day when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] was speaking, or soon after he had spoken, on the Chinese question, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] called attention to the fact that this contract-labor law passed in 1864 was not repealed until 1883. There was a law passed in 1864 that enabled citizens of the United States to make contracts with foreigners and bring them here to labor.

Before we consider whether that was a wise law or not, we must consider the condition of the country at that time. What was it? There was an immense number of men, either in the Army or associated with the Army or engaged in supplying the wants of the Army, that is to say, people who were withdrawn from the productive industries of the country, and their labor applied to a destructive purpose, not to the creation of wealth.

How many men were there? I find the committee here saying a million of men. Why, Mr. President, that only refers to the men that we had in the Army of the North. That does not refer to the great number of people who were called from other pursuits to do things that necessarily grew out of the war. With a million of men in the Army and petitions coming here from farmers, from manufacturers, and from numbers of other people asking for legislation that would enable them to go abroad and bring labor—not Chinese labor, because that was prohibited by the act of 1862—but to bring reputable Irishmen, Norwegians, Germans, and that class of men into the United States faster than they were coming, we passed the act of 1864 at that particular time to meet a demand made necessary by the war. How many people ever came under it I do not know. It was not repealed until 1883. It was not repealed because I venture to say up to that time there had never been any abuses under it. At least no complaint had been made by anybody that I am aware of.

In 1883 that question came before the House and the House passed the repealing bill. Let me go back a moment to say that in 1864 a committee was appointed consisting of three Republicans and two Democrats to take into consideration with reference to this, not only the petitions but the President's message, President Lincoln having recommended that some steps should be taken to increase the immigration because of the scarcity of labor. Two of the three were Republicans and two Democrats, one of the Democrats being from Missouri and one from Indiana, and the Democrats made a report with the three Republicans in favor of the bill, and it can not be shown that a single Democrat voted against it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Who was the Democrat from Missouri?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. Rollins, a reputable Democrat and a man of a good deal of ability, as I recollect. That was a peculiar condition of affairs. We wanted labor. We had taken away the bone and sinew of the country and put them into the Army. We had to supply them with goods, we had to supply them with food, we had to supply the people all over the country with necessaries, and for that purpose we wanted the labor and we welcomed the laborers, and we took special pains to get them and to bring them here.

Mr. STEWART. It was a war measure.

Mr. TELLER. As suggested by the Senator from Nevada, it was a war measure. It was a proper measure for the time.

In 1885 a repealing bill came into the Senate, and one would suppose after hearing the Senator from Kentucky, who I am sorry to see is not in his seat, that he rose immediately when it came here and moved to do as was done yesterday with this bill—put it through without the formality of a reference to a committee. I supposed before I looked up the record that there was a scramble and rush on the part of the Democrats to get to this bill in order that they might pass it. Why, Mr. President, I assert here that when it passed the Senate the only opposition found to it came from the Democratic side of this Chamber. Of the nine votes against it only one was a Republican, and he had declared before he came to that vote why he should so vote, because, as he declared, the bill was not sufficiently explicit. But the Democrats did not put it on that ground. The Senator from Alabama who sits nearest to me [Mr. MORGAN] moved hostile amendments to it, and the Senator from Texas who sits farthest from me [Mr. COKE] moved an amendment to exclude from the operation of the bill all agricultural laborers, as the old contract-labor bill was then about to be repealed; while on this side of the Chamber every man voted for its repeal save one, including our candidate for the Presidency. He not only voted for it, but expressed his desire that it should pass in a little colloquy that he had with the Senator from Texas.

When they came to the question whether they would make a practical bill of this, and when an amendment was offered providing that it should be the duty of the United States attorney to prosecute infractions of the law as contained in this new bill about to be passed, which not only repealed the other but made it a penal offense to import labor under contract, when it was desired to make it effective by saying that the United States attorneys should be charged with its execution, I believe the only votes against that proposition came from the Democratic side of the Chamber.

There was a long discussion on the bill. The Senator from Alabama spoke several times on it. Both the Senators from Texas spoke on it. The present Republican candidate for governor of the great State of New York was one of those sitting on this side of the Chamber, and he brought to the support of that bill his great intellect, not simply by his vote, but by his earnest effort on this floor for its passage as it had come from the House, without being deprived of its valuable features, as was attempted by the Senator from Alabama, the Senator from South Carolina, and the two Senators from Texas.

The Senator from South Carolina moved a substitute for the bill—a substitute which, with the concluding section (section 4), would have absolutely nullified the bill, would have rendered it innocuous so far as concerned the accomplishment of the purpose for which it was intended, and would have opened the door for the importation of contract labor of nearly all kinds into this country. Such was also the practical effect of the amendment of the Senator from Texas. Such was the practical effect of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, who desired to allow skilled labor to be introduced under the contract system. This amendment also was moved:

And it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the proper district to prosecute every such suit at the expense of the United States.

On that there were 43 yeas and 15 nays. Let me read who voted "nay" on that amendment. It was not an unreasonable thing when the Senate was going to pass an act of this kind that somebody should be authorized to carry it out. Who voted "nay?" Mr. Bayard, the present Secretary of State; Mr. BECK, who criticised the original bill; Mr. BROWN, Mr. Fair, Mr. Garland, Mr. Groome, Mr. HAMPTON, Mr. HARRIS, Mr. Maxey, Mr. MORGAN, Mr. Pendleton, Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. VANCE, and Mr. Williams of Kentucky. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], whom I do not see in his seat, stated that he was paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and that if Mr. HOAR were present, Mr. COKE would vote "nay." Mr. RANSOM, when his name was called, said he was paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Logan], and if that Senator were present, Mr. RANSOM would vote "nay." So there were practically 17 votes from the Democrats against the enforcement of this law, and not one Republican.

I never like to mention a Senator who is not present, but I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senator from Kentucky—I feel that I have a right, however, to do so, and I regret that he is not here that I may call attention to his record in his presence—the Senator from Kentucky voted, it will be noticed, on that amendment. It was then proposed to send the bill back to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report, not later than the 20th, a bill that should more effectually reach the end desired. That was the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], the only Republican who voted against the bill. He stated that in his judgment the bill did not come up to what it ought to be. I want to say that by an examination of the record I find no Democrat basing his vote on that ground, that which everybody understood was a hostile movement; for its enemies would naturally vote to send it to a committee.

On that, the following Senators voted to send the bill back: Mr. Bayard, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. Garland, Mr. GIBSON, Mr. Groome, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. HAMPTON, Mr. HARRIS, Mr. Maxey, Mr. MORGAN, Mr. Pendleton, Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. VANCE, and Mr. Williams. Those are all Democracts but one; nobody voted with them from this side of the Chamber except the mover of the resolution. There was no debate intervening between the vote of the Senator from Kentucky to which I first called attention and the last vote on the bill. On the passage of the bill the vote stood in the negative as follows: Mr. BLAIR, Mr. Groome, Mr. HAMPTON, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. Maxey, Mr. MORGAN, Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. VANCE, and Mr. Williams. They all voted against the bill. The Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Delaware, Mr. Bayard, who had voted five minutes previously against the provision for the enforcement of the act, were absent and did not vote. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] who had voted before against the proposition turned around and voted for the bill. Neither the Senator from Kentucky nor the Senator from Delaware, Mr. Bayard, was paired, so far as the record shows, nor did they make any excuse for not voting. In other words, after voting for all the amendments that were hostile to the bill, after voting as they had done repeatedly for things that would destroy the bill, then, when it came to the final vote, they were so politic that they both dodged.

And now, Mr. President, do you not think that it is pretty cheeky for the Senator from Kentucky to read us a lecture from that side of the Chamber on the labor-contract bill? Who passed the bill? Republicans passed it. Who signed it? A Republican Executive signed it. The Republicans went out of power and the Democrats came into power, and they have not lifted a finger to enforce that law from that day to this.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator permit me to make a remark in that connection?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to say that I have had sent to me at this session affidavits from citizens in my own State showing that they laid before the United States district attorney of their district affidavits of the clearest and strongest character, affidavit after affidavit, showing the importation of laborers from Canada to perform work in my State, and asking and urging prosecution, and the district attorney refused month after month to act, and never has acted.

Mr. PAYNE. If the Senators will pardon me, I might mention a case arising under that act—the case of the pastor of Trinity Church, in New York. In that case there was a prosecution and a conviction and fine, as I understood.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Ohio calls my attention to the fact that the Democratic administration have enforced this law. I was under the impression that they had not; but when the Senator calls my attention to it I remember that there was a religious congregation in New York, Trinity Church congregation, a great church in New York City, a Democratic church, mainly. It is the high "mucky-mucky," as they say out West, of the Democratic party that assemble at Trinity Church for prayers, and nothing would do them but to have an English minister, in accordance with the general tendency of this Democratic Administration. They desired to have "something English, you know" [laughter], and they sent abroad and got an English minister. They contracted with him before he came to this country as to how much should be his salary. And now let me say that the Democratic party did not move that prosecution. Probably it is to their credit that they did not, because the law was not intended to cover anything of that kind. You could hardly deny to the rich and high-headed people that attend Trinity Church the privilege of going to England or anywhere else to get a preacher if they wanted to do so. But some man in New York who thought he had a grievance against the church instituted a suit and gave them a good deal of trouble, and finally, I think, got this minister fined.

I am obliged to the Senator from Ohio for this the only instance in which it has been attempted to enforce this law against a poor preacher, and then they were unwilling prosecutors. Italians and Hungarians have been brought in, and according to the testimony produced by a committee of the House of Representatives the prosecuting attorney's attention has been repeatedly called to it, and I think the attention of the Attorney-General has been called to it. The public has at least heard of it, if the officers have not; and yet there has never been a single prosecution, and the only one that the Democratic Senators can mention when they come to defend this Administration is the case of the Trinity Church preacher.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. TELLER. I will. If the Senator from Delaware can mention another case I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. GRAY. There might have been a great many other cases, and I have no doubt that whenever a case has been brought to the attention of the executive officers it has been attended to; but there is one case as to which I can refresh the recollection of the Senator, a case which is rather conspicuous. I refer to the case occurring in the past spring, where the owners of fishing vessels in Gloucester were bringing down from Canada by the ship-load Canadian fishermen to enter "the nursery of American seamen." That thing was called to the attention of the district attorney, and prosecutions were at once commenced, and a ship-load at least were turned back. Whether they got back by rail or otherwise I do not know.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator say that anybody was prosecuted for that?

Mr. GRAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I do not so understand it, Mr. President. I know there was an announcement, a proclamation, but I never knew that it went further than a proclamation.

Mr. GRAY. People are not indicted, tried, and convicted the same day, as the Senator knows.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator from Colorado will allow me to say a word, I shall be a trifle more specific about the case in my own State. There was a railroad chartered there and a leading Democrat of the State—the leading Democrat of the State—by his nearest business associate, undertook to build the railroad; and I have seen sworn copies of a dozen affidavits, I may say, in which the written contract is set forth by which those parties are shown to have brought Canadian laborers to the State of New Hampshire to do railroad work in competition with others who would have been glad to do it, the common laborers of that State, and the sworn affidavits being produced and laid before the district attorney and the prosecutions of the cases urged from time to time, the parties complaining were never able to accomplish the initiation of any prosecutions whatever. That is a clear instance of the failure to prosecute a violation of the law. I will put those papers in the RECORD if I can put my hands on them.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the law was passed in 1883. Were there not some transactions involving the violation of the law under the administration of Mr. Arthur which were not prosecuted?

Mr. BLAIR. The law was passed in 1885.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; in 1885.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Colorado how many prosecutions were commenced during the administration of President Arthur?

Mr. TELLER. This act was passed in the last days of Mr. Arthur's administration.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood the Senator to say 1883.

Mr. TELLER. I might have said 1883, but if I did I meant 1885. I was not aware that there was any fisherman on the New England coast prosecuted; but I am not surprised, because if there were any prosecutions anywhere it would be of that class of people. I have yet to learn that there have been any convictions of those persons or any others.

When the Senator interrupted me I was about to say that the testimony in New York before a committee of the House of Representatives that is over there taking testimony shows that these matters have been repeatedly brought to the notice of the district attorney of the United States, and, as the witnesses have stated, he paid no attention whatever to them.

Now, Mr. President, what is the condition of this bill and what are the circumstances under which it comes to us? Yesterday, as the Senate was proceeding with its business in the usual way, there came in a bill which I learn now has never seen a committee of any body, of either this House or of any other. It never ran the gantlet that every bill runs of criticism; it has never been printed. I do not know that I am at liberty to say who introduced it in the House of Representatives. I do not know how far I can go upon a question of that kind. I can state what I have seen in the public press, and I suppose I have a right to read what is in the RECORD, and if I have, perhaps I have, the right to say that this appears to have been introduced by a gentleman who is not a member of the committee that generally takes cognizance of these things, not only not a member of the committee, but I may say without offense to him, a gentleman that in no sense and under no circumstances has a right to speak for American labor.

Without going to a committee the bill goes through the House and comes here. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] said with great frankness that it was a political movement. I do not find in the RECORD that this bill was drawn in the Solicitor's office, but I hear it outside. I hear that it was sent down from the executive department of the Government in hot haste to the House of Representatives to be passed. I do not know that that is so; I only say that that is the rumor, that is the report. I submit to the Senate, however, that it does not take very much to make one believe that in the quick passage of this bill through the House of Representatives there was something more than a desire to protect American labor against the incursions of Asiatic labor.

If I were to look over the whole House and select a man who would most fitly represent the American people who toil, I should hardly have thought of selecting the man who came hot haste with that bill and who succeeded in passing it through the House as very few men would have been able to do, and he succeeded only because he is a high priest in the Democratic church. It is a bill which could only have been considered by the unanimous consent of the House, the Speaker's recognition being first had. This occurred immediately on the reading and approval of the Journal. He succeeded only because he represents the President of the United States more than any other man in the Democratic party, as he did at St. Louis and as he does everywhere, and who is reported to have contributed ten times as much money to the campaign fund as his Democratic President has given. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I know that so far as he is concerned if he chooses to give $100,000 to the Democratic campaign fund he has a right to do it. I hear that he is able to do it; that he has made his millions of money out of the laboring men of this country. It will not be amiss for me to read what he himself has said of himself in the Congressional Directory.

I may ask the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], who is the special antagonist here of trusts, what he thinks of letting the Democratic House of Representatives be controlled and run by this great Democrat, who is conspicuous not for his great intellect, but for his great railroad interests, of which he boasts in the Congressional Directory. Perhaps the Senator from Texas has not seen the statement, so I am going to have it read from the Directory. I will ask the Chief Clerk to read it, because, as Brother BLAIR says, he is a better reader than I am.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Congressional Directory.]

TWENTY-SEVENTH DISTRICT, PENNSYLVANIA—COUNTIES: ERIE, VENANGO, AND WARREN.

WILLIAM L. SCOTT, of Erie, was born in the city of Washington, D. C., July 2, 1828, his parents being residents of Virginia; he received a common-school education; served as page in the House of Representatives from 1840 to 1846; settled in Erie, Pa., in 1848, and was employed as a clerk in the shipping business; engaged, in 1850, in the coal and shipping business, owning and running several vessels on the lakes; subsequently became largely interested in the manufacture of iron and the mining of coal, as well as in the construction and operation of railroads, either as president or director of various lines, aggregating over 22,000 miles of completed road, the greatest number of miles of railroad probably which any one individual was ever an officer or director of; was a district delegate to the national Democratic convention held in the city of New York in 1868, and a delegate at large from the State of Pennsylvania to the Democratic national convention held in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1880, and also represented the State of Pennsylvania on the Democratic national committee from 1876 to 1884; was elected mayor of the city of Erie in 1866, and again in 1871; was elected to the Forty-ninth and re-elected to the Fiftieth Congress as a Democrat, receiving 14,787 votes against 13,574 votes for Mackey, Republican, and 2,140 votes for Andrews, Prohibitionist.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take this occasion to remark that while it is undoubtedly allowable to refer to the acts of the other House of Congress generally, it is, the Chair thinks, a violation of privilege to refer to the individual character or to the acts or conduct of members of that body. It interferes with the absolute independence which ought to exist between the two Houses of Congress; and the Chair thinks that perhaps this debate has already gone further than it should have gone. The general parliamentary law on this subject is so well defined that the Chair thinks it is unnecessary to allude to it further.

Mr. TELLER. I shall not address myself further to any member of Congress. I think, however, that when I choose to speak of a person who has acted in another capacity I have the unquestioned right so to do. I will speak, then, of a member of this great Democratic committee which has been organized for the purpose of carrying on this campaign. I trust that what I have said, if it should look as if I referred to a member of Congress, will be understood and taken as referring to a member of the Democratic committee and not to a member of Congress.

Mr. BLAIR. And also, if the Senator will permit me, if that is so, what is found in the Congressional Directory should be taken out of the RECORD.

Mr. TELLER. I have no fault to find with the Directory.

Mr. BLAIR. It is an official document of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I get my information from all sources possible.

I was referring to the hot haste with which this bill came here, the fact that it was not before a committee, the fact that it came here in a manner not usual for a bill of this character to come. I said, and I repeat, that rumor says that this was brought out for the purpose of effecting a revolution on the Pacific coast. I do not know whether that is true or not, and I do not care.

If I can find something good coming out of this Administration, I do not care what the motive may be. I do not care whether the legislation goes on the statute-book because the chairman of the Democratic committee or a member of it is anxious to make political capital or otherwise. I am for the legislation; I welcome it, and I welcome it just as much as though it were consistent with the past conduct of this Administration. Why, sir, when in March we received a treaty from the hands of the Administration which was to be ratified by the Senate, and was ratified by the Senate, I was not in favor of it. It was proposed to do then by consent what now we propose under this bill to do without any consent whatever, and in effect to abrogate a treaty; but, as I said yesterday, I have been in favor of that all the time, and I do not stultify myself when I vote for this measure now, as I have voted for bills of similar import on former occasions.

It was rather a singular charge on the part of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] that we were actuated by political motives over here in not opposing the bill. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], seeing such an unusual proceeding as a bill coming in here in hot haste—a bill that might impair a treaty, might displace it, as I said yesterday—that Senator, with a good deal of hesitation, seemed disposed to object, but I noticed that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] rose and said, "Why, the Senator from Mississippi does not object," and the Senator from Mississippi immediately sat down and said he did not object. He caught the twinkle of the eye of the Senator from Missouri and saw that there was politics in the bill, and he sat down, and then in order that he might recover from the blunder that he came so near making he got up and charged on us that we have been in favor of Chinese immigration.

Mr. President, I do not know whether it is dignified or not for the executive department of the Government to play with great questions like this. I do not know that it will enhance our character or increase our dignity among the people of the earth to have it appear that on the eve of an election the Administration of this Government are anxious for the passage of a bill that they had been opposed to sixty days before—opposed to when they sent the treaty here; otherwise they did not need any treaty; a treaty, as I said yesterday, that ought not to have come here, a treaty that opened the door in my judgment for continued frauds by means of the certificates for which it provided. Every man knew that those certificates would be used for the purpose of keeping up the Chinese population in California.

Everybody familiar with these people knew that there is not a man on this floor who, if twenty of these Chinamen were before him, and walked out into the hall and came back, could tell whether they were the same twenty or a different twenty. They have none of the facial characteristics that our people have to distinguish them. They all look alike, and they are all alike, and the clause put in there that he who had a wife, he who had debts, he who had property might continue to come amounted to nothing but an increased immigration. Even death would not save them, for if a Chinaman got a certificate and went back and died another man took his place. They are a class of people on whom an oath has no obligation whatever.

The treaty, I say, was not fit to be made, but it was made upon the theory that we could not legislate without a treaty. Here we have the bill now, ready to be passed, and when it passes it will receive the sanction of the Executive, because it is hoped by the Democrats that they will get some advantage in California from this bill. I repeat, I am for the proposed legislation, and if it can only be wrung out of this Democratic Administration because they are in extremis I submit I mean to vote for it, and I shall be glad to see it a law.

I had expected something. I did not think they could try the Morey letter. That was played out eight years ago. That served its purpose to some extent. It lost us many votes undoubtedly. They had to have something new, and this is it. Mr. President, it will not win.

Neither will the cry which comes up from the Democratic side of the Chamber that they are the special defenders of American labor because they propose to exclude the Chinese win. You would close the door against the Chinaman himself, but you would open the door to all his productions, to all the fruits of his labor, and all that he shall create, to all that grows in his land either with or without his assistance. You would feed him and clothe him on Chinese soil, but you would admit his productions. How much better is that than to allow him to come here? If he comes to California he buys some things of the California merchants; he contributes in some slight degree—slight, I admit—to the prosperity of the California people; but if he lives at home in his own land he contributes nothing.

You are in favor of free goods, but you are opposed to free men. You want to keep the men out and to let their products in. If you can distinguish, the laboring people of this country can not, when you say that you will let in the rice that is raised by the Chinese—ah, you do not want to let in cheap rice; I had better take something else—when you say that you will let in the labor of the Chinese mechanic.

Mr. STEWART. Boots, shoes, and clothing.

Mr. TELLER. Boots, shoes, and clothing. The Chinese can make all sorts of wares that the American people use. When you say you will let those things in without a duty you give away your whole case.

The American laborer will not be fooled by that any more than he is by the declaration made by the Senator from Mississippi over and over again that he and his associates represent American labor; that the American laborer's interest and happiness and welfare are dearer to them than to us. Is there anything in the history of the Democratic party, either North or South, which justifies that claim? I repeat what I started out with early in this speech, they can not point to a single great thing that they have ever done for labor.

We hear the Democrats sometimes claiming that the act of 1841 which gave to us the pre-emption law was a Democratic law. It was a Whig law. I have heard ignorant Democrats on the stump declare that the homestead law was the result of Democratic administration, when by the vote of a Democratic Vice-President in the Senate one homestead law proposed was defeated; by a veto of a Democratic President another homestead law was defeated, and it was only when the Republicans had both branches of Congress and the Executive that they were able to secure for the people a law which has given homes to a million men; which has given against Democratic votes, against Democratic influence, against Democratic opposition, a million of homes to American laborers. One-fifth of the farms in the United States come from a homestead law passed by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President.

How long is it since in this Chamber a distinguished member of this body from South Carolina declared that the mechanics of the North, styling them "greasy mechanics," were the mud-sills of society and unfit to associate with the body-servants of a gentleman in South Carolina? How long is it since Calhoun in this Chamber declared that the proper relation between capital and labor was the relation that existed in South Carolina where capital owned labor? How long is it since, in a Democratic convention, a distinguished citizen of Georgia advocated, with the approbation of the convention, the opening of the slave trade, that they might have cheap labor in the South? Only twenty-eight years have passed since that was heard with the approbation, I repeat, of the Democratic members of that convention from the South and of a great number also from the North.

Mr. PAYNE. May I interrupt the Senator from Colorado? I happen to have had personal connection with that convention and I heard everything that transpired. I was upon the committee on resolutions. I wish to deny that the proposition to which he refers was received with applause. It was more of a burlesque than anything else, and I never heard any person treat it in any other way except General Butler, who, when he retired from the convention at Baltimore, declared that he was shocked at the proposition of Mr. Gaulden. General Butler is the only person I ever knew who took it for granted that it was a serious proposition. It was not a sincere proposition, nor did any one receive it as such except General Butler, who claimed that it shocked his conscience.

Mr. TELLER. The report shows not only what I have said, that the proposition was received with favor, but it shows that Isaiah Rynders, a Democratic worker of the great city of New York, a Democratic United States marshal then, if I remember correctly, said in his place in that body, "You will find plenty of sympathy for that proposition up in our section of the country."

Mr. President, it was not the raving of a Georgian. Does not the Senator from Ohio remember that in 1858 there was a commercial convention at Montgomery which passed two resolutions in favor of opening up the slave trade? Does he not remember that at Memphis, in 1859, another commercial convention indorsed the action of the Montgomery convention of 1858? Does he not remember that the most prominent magazine that was ever published in the South, publicly and openly, clear down to 1860, advocated the opening up of the slave trade for the avowed purpose of filling the broad West with slaves? Does he not remember that Henry A. Wise, in a public speech in Virginia, which was world-wide at the time, in expressing his dissatisfaction with the admission of California, declared that if they could have put slaves into the mines of California they would have added 100 per cent. in value to every negro in Virginia? Does not the Senator know, and does not everybody know, that all over the South everywhere the public press and in public conventions the sentiment was not only in favor of buying men, but stealing them—that they were not satisfied to buy them, but they proposed to go to Africa and steal them? The Senator knows it, and so do I. I was living and old enough to know, and I was enough a student of history to read then and not to have forgotten now. I know the part the Senator from Ohio played in that convention in 1860 as well as any man can know who was not there.

Mr. PAYNE. As the Senator refers to me——

Mr. TELLER. Before the Senator proceeds let me say that I do not mean to charge that the Senator from Ohio had any sympathy with those sentiments. He did not belong to that wing of the Democratic party.

Mr. PAYNE. The Senator asked me if I did not know it. I know nothing about the matter referred to occurring at Montgomery. I was not there, but I was at Charleston; and in further explanation of the matter in that convention I wish to state the reason given by the man who made the declaration in favor of opening the slave trade. He said that in his section they purchased their slaves from Maryland and Virginia, which gave the people there a very profitable business, and he was in favor of opening the slave trade direct, because they would get them a great deal cheaper.

Mr. TELLER. I have not read that speech lately. When that speech was made I was a young man. I was watching public events. Although then engaged in my profession I had come from the laboring man's ranks. I had blistered my hands with honest toil to get my education, and the words that went out from that convention were blistered in my memory so that I shall never forget them. I said, "here is the great Democratic party, in which I had been reared and trained, in favor of degrading the American laborer by the side of the African," and when General Butler rose in that convention and said, "I propose to leave this convention, for I shall never sit in a convention where the advocacy of the slave trade, piracy by law, shall be received with approval," he went up 100 per cent. in my estimation, and I have never forgotten him for that act.

Mr. President, it was not the raving of a lunatic. When the Wanderer landed on the coast of Georgia the Government was not strong enough to punish the relative of a man since distinguished in this body. The Government had not the power to punish him according to law, and he went scot-free. Senators on this floor from the South, if they did not advocate it, declared that the Government had no right to prevent it. The press everywhere in the South was in favor of the slave trade, because, they said, they wanted slaves to go into the new Territories. Mr. Gaulden, who made the speech of which I spoke, in the convention said, "We can not make another slave State unless we have free importations of Africans." I do not think the Senator from Ohio wanted it, and Mr. Gaulden said the people of Virginia did not want it. Why did they not want it? He said it was because the people of Virginia wanted to sell to the new States or the Gulf States the slaves they had raised.

Does not the Senator from Ohio know, and do not all Senators know, that when the war broke out the traffic in human flesh and human blood was $30,000,000 a year, and that that traffic found advocates in every Democratic convention that was ever held; that it found advocates in Democratic organs both North and South? Yet they propose to tell me that they are the friends of labor! When did you get this new light? When did you become all at once the champions of labor? When did you want to elevate and lift up the laboring man? You proposed to put all who labored by the side of the ignorant negro and to make the social position of the white laborer just what the social position of the negro was.

Have you forgotten the letter that Cassius M. Clay sent to our convention in 1856 at Philadelphia, where he pictured the condition of the white man of the South who did not own slaves? His condition was absolutely worse than that of the slave himself—ignorant, degraded, afraid and ashamed to work. There can be no such thing as decent respect shown to labor when it is brought in contact with a class of labor that it was proposed to bring it in contact with and to keep it there. Slaves and freemen do not work side by side.

To-day the gentlemen on the other side are engaged in attempting to enslave labor in the North as much as they were in 1859 and 1860. The claim that you propose to open the markets of the world to our laborers, to our manufacturers, for the purpose of increasing American labor, is but a pretense; it is not true. How can it be done? How is the wages of the man who toils for his coat or a pair of shoes or a yard of cloth to be increased by bringing him in contact, without protection, with all the labor of the world? You deny the right of the Government to protect labor. You declare that it is against the Constitution; and there is where we part. We say it is not only the right but it is the duty of the Government to protect labor. You say you can not do it by law. You do not propose a system of economy that will do it. It can not be done except by law.

Mr. President, I do not like to refer to these old things, and yet it is perfectly proper when the Senator from Mississippi, who until within a few years believed in buying labor (and who I think to-day will not stand in his place and say that he thinks it is wicked for one man to own another), taunts me with not having in my heart the interests of the great masses of the people with whom I must have the closest affinity. Is there anybody so damnably ignorant anywhere as to believe that labor would have been happier in this country if the rebellion had succeeded? Does anybody believe that if there had been no war and the old conditions still existed labor anywhere would have been better fed, better clothed, better housed, and would have occupied a higher plane than it does now? Does not everybody know that the great advancement made by the laboring people of the country has been because of the fact that we made it impossible that they should be put by the side of the degraded serf?

Mr. President, I might mention many other things to support my position that it was cheap labor the Democratic party wanted and it was cheap labor for which they went to war. It is cheap labor that they want to-day. Mr. President, I do not want cheap labor. I know that cheap labor may be had from Chinamen; I know it may be had from slaves, but I do not want it, and I do not intend by my vote to have it. I believe that the American laborers all over this country are sufficiently intelligent to see that free trade means cheap labor, that it is akin to the old system which we abolished, and I do not believe that they will kindly listen to lectures given to me from the other side of the Chamber by the Senator from Mississippi or the Senator from Alabama, or any other Senator who will stand in his place now, or who would a few years ago, and assert the right of one man to own and control another.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

SAMUEL FERGUSON BEACH, EXECUTOR, AND OTHERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting findings of fact in the case of Samuel Ferguson Beach, executor, and others against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

ALLEGED CORRUPTION IN REFERENCE TO LIBRARY BUILDING.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to submit for immediate consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee engaged in investigating the construction of the new Library building be directed to inquire and report to this House whether any member of the House, acting by and for himself or in concert and combination with others, has sought by persuasion, intimidation, or other corrupt or improper means, to influence or control the action of Mr. J. L. Smithmeyer, the architect of said building, in the selection, acceptance, or approval of inferior or improper materials to be used in the construction of said building.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not desire to make any remarks upon this resolution. I take it for granted the House will not object to an investigation of an allegation or intimation of this kind made by a member of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to know whether the gentleman has any information of any improper action of any member of the House, on which this resolution is based.

Mr. KELLEY. I make the proposition to the House on information, the first facts of which came to me in the early part of this session and have been corroborated by increasing testimony and additional facts. I shall name the member when I get before the committee, if the House will permit me to go there.

Mr. BLOUNT. Upon that statement I make no objection to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is a privileged resolution, as it relates to the conduct of a member of the House.

Mr. OATES. It seems to me the gentleman from Pennsylvania might very properly broaden the language of his resolution a little. The resolution proposes an investigation as to improper influences in regard to the acceptance or approval of inferior materials. It seems to me there should also be inquiry whether there was any improper influence in order to procure the paying of a larger price than that for which materials could be bought in the market.

Mr. KELLEY. I will accept such an amendment as the gentleman indicates, if he will embody it in suitable language.

Mr. OATES. I ask the Clerk to insert that amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. I want the investigation to be as thorough as we can make it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] that if the words "inferior or improper" before "materials" be struck out, the language of the resolution, without further modification, might cover the point suggested by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. KELLEY. Whatever tends to broaden the scope of the inquiry I will accept.

Mr. OATES. As I understand from the reading of the resolution——

Mr. COX. Let it be again read. There is no objection to any inquiry that will strike anybody who has been engaged in wrong-doing.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. OATES. After the word "material" I would suggest the addition of the words "at a higher rate than the market price."

Mr. KELLEY. I do not object to the modification.

Mr. BLOUNT. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania any objection to making this a special committee?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Alabama will be incorporated in the resolution.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia, as to whether I would object to a special committee. As the committee in charge of this matter has taken much testimony touching the Library building, I think it had better proceed with that investigation. And I am about to ask, Mr. Speaker, that I may be permitted to insert in the RECORD a sworn statement of Mr. Smithmeyer, made up chiefly of extracts from the record of the commission, which I submit as supplementary to my remarks during the debate on the provision for the Library building in the sundry civil appropriation bill. This is sworn testimony, which is legitimate in connection with my statement in that debate, and I ask that, as part of it, it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let it be read.

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, let us hear what it is.

Mr. KELLEY. I have no objection, but thought that the time of the House might be saved by printing it instead. I will state that it is a communication under oath handed to the chairman of the special committee on yesterday with a tender of cross-examination by this architect.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the document.

The Clerk read as follows:

SIR: My attention has been called to the fact that Mr. Edward Clark, a member of the commission for the construction of the Congressional Library building, in his sworn testimony made the statement that I have had full authority and supervision of the work in connection with the Congressional Library building, thus intimating that I am responsible for all the expenses incurred. In this allegation Mr. Clark does me a grave wrong.

In my testimony before your committee, dated June 1, 1888, I stated as follows: "Prior to May 3, 1887, a number of old buildings on the site were being removed and extensive excavations made under the direct orders, as I believed, of the commission. With this work I had no connection whatever. Prior to that date no expense, except for technical assistance and actual office expenses, was known to or incurred by me; since that date all expenses attached to the work proper have required the sanction of the commission and my formal approval." The expenditures on the old buildings above referred to were, in my opinion, excessive, and, together with the unnecessary excavation on the southwest corner of B and First streets above mentioned, involved the worse than useless expenditure of many thousand dollars.

My dissent from the execution of this work was communicated to the commission in three letters, dated February 20, 1887, March 24, 1887, and April 19, 1887, respectively. Mr. Commissioner Clark stated before your committee that "every piece of brick could have been used, not only put in the wall, but there was concrete required to cover the cellar floors, etc." He had evidently not tested the quality of these bricks and bats as it was my duty to do, nor did he know what weight the foundations and walls would have to sustain. In this case a resisting strength of 5,000 pounds to the square foot is required, while some of the bricks taken out of these old buildings crumbled under a pressure of less than one-quarter of that weight. The great variations in the sizes of these bricks (the difference ranging from one-eighth to one-quarter inch in thickness, and one-half inch in width or length) was another serious objection to their use. Those of some of the buildings had been laid in cement and others in lime-mortar, and fully one-half of them were broken into bats. Some of them were a century old and others but a year, and some were so soft that the rains and frosts of one winter would have dissolved them like snow in the hot sun. In short, they were worthless for the purpose to which Mr. Clark says they should have been applied, and their use would have jeopardized the stability of the structure.

It is this character of false economy which advocates the use of inferior materials in massive buildings on account of their cheapness; that invites calamities to stately and costly structures, and brings the architectural profession into discredit before the world.

The fact that this worthless lot of bats has cost the Government as much as the best quality of merchantable bricks fresh from the kiln would have cost was not my fault. Mr. Commissioner Clark with Mr. Trainer, the clerk (or secretary) of the commission, assumed the management of this matter, and are therefore responsible for it. The number of bricks and bats on the premises (according to Mr. Clark's statement before your committee) was from two to three millions. Assuming that two and a half millions of bricks and bats would therefore be a fair estimate, from this statement they should, at $4 per thousand, the price stated by Mr. Clark under oath, have yielded $10,000, instead of $2,185, the amount actually received as per report of the commission. A deficiency of $7,815 is therefore proven by the testimony of Mr. Clark. Again it will be noticed that if there were two and a half millions of bricks and bats on the premises, and only $2,185 were received for them, they produced but 87 cents per thousand, instead of $4.

To illustrate the looseness and inaccuracy of Mr. Clark's sworn testimony, it is proper that I should state these facts: The city measurer investigated the fact and reported that there were one million eight hundred and seventy-five thousand bricks and bats on the premises and there was received for brick and bats which had been selected from the whole lot the above-stated sum of $2,185, showing an average price of $1.16⅛ per thousand. The balance, which consisted of decomposed salmon bricks and fractured bats, could not be sold at any price and had to be hauled away as rubbish at Government expense.

Current experience proves that a laborer can take down, clean, and stack up 500 bricks a day. Thus at $1.50 per day (Government pay) the cleaning, etc., of 1,000 bricks cost $3. The cost of taking down and cleaning 1,875,000 bricks at $3 per 1,000 amounts, therefore, to $5,627, for which bricks the Government received $2,185, having thus wasted $3,442 on that brick transaction alone. As an evidence of the quality of these bricks, Mr. Clark informed the committee that he had used 60,000 of them, presumably in his garden wall around the west front of the Capitol. For this work, which is to bear no superincumbent weight, they may possibly have been good enough.

To recur to my protest against these operations of Messrs. Clark and Trainer, permit me to state that in my letter to the commission of February 20, 1887, I said: "I deem it my duty to call your attention to the fact that the excavations now being made upon the site of the Congressional Library building have evidently been ordered under a grave misapprehension, and should be stopped immediately. In places where the streets intersect at low grade, and especially where the work is now going on, it will be necessary to fill up again so as to make the terraces required to give the building its proper appearance and avoid a portion of it from being sunk into the ground. The inclosed plans and computations will show the different levels and their relative positions, and also the proper disposition of the surroundings, so as to produce the best results. They will also illustrate the necessity of filling up again where the grading is now going on, and demonstrate the necessity of having this work stopped immediately."

The work on the excavation referred to in this letter was likewise under the direction of Mr. Commissioner Clark, assisted by Mr. Secretary Trainer. They employed or discharged laborers, foremen, horses and carts, and fixed their wages; they paid $4 per day to foremen and $1.50 per day to laborers for eight hours' work, while the foremen and laborers of the contractors were paid but $2 or $2.50 per day, and $1 and $1.25 per day of ten hours, though the two bodies of men worked side by side. They ordered their movements, attended to the pay-rolls, and made all settlements for materials and labor, and determined what work should be done without examining plans or surveys, or even consulting the architect. In fact, they did not even notify him of their purpose or proceedings. It is impossible to state from the disjointed memoranda produced as the record of their expenditures what further losses the Government sustained by their ill-judged operations. I would certainly have been derelict in my duty had I permitted this planless procedure to continue without another effort to arrest it. I therefore wrote again to the commission on March 24, 1887, and used the following language:

"I deem it my duty to again call your attention to the fact that expensive and unnecessary excavations continue to be made upon the site of the new Congressional Library building. I am at loss to know for what purpose these excavations are intended. Certainly not for the proposed structure. Much of the earth excavated will have to be replaced, thus causing a double expense. I call your attention to this matter with much hesitancy, in fact with a certain sense of intrusion. My position, however, entails a positive responsibility, both to the public and to yourselves, and I feel impelled under these circumstances to write this letter."

No notice of this communication or its predecessor being taken by the commission, I again, on April 19, 1887, addressed them in the following language:

"I request that my duties under my appointment may be clearly defined as to where my responsibility for any part of the work begins and ends. Also, to whom I am responsible and shall make report. Ordinarily this request would be unnecessary, as the duties of architects in connection with buildings erected under their plans are clearly defined and well-established. It is well, therefore, that my duties should be definitely known, to the end that I may not be held responsible in cases where you rely upon the judgment of others. You will of course understand that my professional responsibility is deeply involved in this matter, to an extent equal to, if not greater than, your own. Consequently, I feel that at the beginning there should be established a thorough and complete understanding."

During all this time the work on the excavations proceeded uninterruptedly until (by the end of April, 1887), the cost of it had reached the sum of $3,888, as is shown by the official report of the commission.

As this letter, like its predecessors, failed to elicit a response I, on May 3, 1887, appealed to the commission for a personal hearing, and was invited to appear before them. The statement I made to the commission embodied the facts above stated, and was sustained by the production of the pay-rolls in the Interior Department and by the record of the commission. The result was the stoppage of this worse than useless work, and the transferring of certain powers and authority into my hands, leaving the control and appointment of all persons, including watchmen, excepting only draughtsmen and engineers, in the hands of Messrs. Clark and Trainer.

After having heard my statement and examined the pay-rolls and other vouchers, the chairman of the commission, Mr. Secretary Lamar, gave me earnest personal assurance that I should not be held responsible for these improvident expenditures of public money, and that the responsibility should be placed where it so evidently belonged.

Immediately after this meeting, the Government property on the premises was placed in my control and inventoried by me, and upon my requisition General Meigs transferred to the use of the Library building certain Government property no longer required in the construction of the Pension building of which he had charge. I ordered a new inventory to be made, from which I learned that other and large additions had been made to this species of property, without my knowledge, and upon investigation ascertained that it had been procured from the officer in charge of the State, War, and Navy Department by Mr. Secretary Trainer, on his written request and his allegation that the transfers would promote "economy of public expenditures."

How far from the truth this allegation of Mr. Trainer was is shown by the fact that the presence of the property thus acquired on the premises as Government property was concealed from me by its delivery to the contractor for the concrete work for his private use and profit. On discovering that this valuable property belonged to the Government I addressed the following letter to the commission:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., October 28, 1887.

"Hon. Commissioners for the Construction of the Congressional Library Building:

"GENTLEMEN: I have recently caused an inventory to be made of the United States property upon the site of the Library building, and find among other articles the following:

"One concrete-mixer, complete, one counter-shaft, four boxes for shafts, 14 feet 5 inches rubber-belt gearing, one clutch, one belt-shifter, and one clutch-shifter, one hoisting engine with two drums and shafts complete, together with a full set of oil-cups attached, sixteen open wrenches (assorted), throttle-valve, belt, and steam-pump, complete; one upright boiler and fixtures, consisting of two 1¼-inch globe-valves, one safety-valve, one steam-gauge, three gauge-cocks, one check-valve, gauge-glass and cocks, one grate, one hoe, one hook, and one smoke-stack.

"I have no information of the purchase or acquisition of these articles for the Library building. I would respectfully request to be informed if I am to be held responsible for their safe-keeping. If so, I would point out that it would be well to furnish me with a list of articles so acquired, so that I may exercise proper authority as to their care.

"I would further say that the articles in question constitute a 'plant' for preparing and laying concrete, and I am informed by the secretary (clerk) of the commission that they are now in the possession of the contractor for this work. In the bid made by Mr. Barnes, the contractor, and upon which he was awarded the contract, this plant was to have been furnished by himself. Had it been understood that the Government was to furnish the same the bids of the various competitors for the work would certainly have been lower. I mention this to you for the reason that the work is being done in the blaze of publicity, and the use of this Government 'plant' may possibly provoke unpleasant criticism. Again, is Mr. Barnes to compensate the Government for the wear and tear of this plant?

"Yours, very respectfully,

"J. L. SMITHMEYER,
"Architect Congressional Library Building."

Hon. W. S. HOLMAN,
Chairman of the Committee of Investigation of the Congressional Library Building.

In view of all these facts it becomes apparent that Commissioner Clark's testimony as given to your committee is unworthy of credence and is flagrantly colored by his desire to shield himself and Mr. Trainer from the just consequences of their reckless conduct.

Permit me to say in conclusion that I have assiduously endeavored to avoid dissensions, but have been unable to submit to official wrong-doing without protest. I regret that such protests should have been necessary and have provoked toward me the hostility of parties interested adversely to the Government; but I am compensated for their assaults upon my character by the satisfaction of having performed my duty faithfully and with the approval of the majority of the Commission for the Construction of the Congressional Library Building.

I am, with great respect, truly, yours,

J. L. SMITHMEYER.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, District of Columbia, ss:

J. L. Smithmeyer, being duly sworn, upon oath doth depose and say that he prepared the foregoing statement and knows the contents thereof.

That the facts therein stated are true to the best of his knowledge and belief.

[SEAL.] ALVYN W. COLEMAN.
Notary Public.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that the communication mentions certain plans or diagrams. Does the gentleman desire to have them printed?

Mr. KELLEY. This is an extract from the communication made to the commission. The diagrams accompanied the original communication; but this is only an extract.

The SPEAKER. Because the Chair was going to suggest that it would require a special order to permit the printing of the diagrams in the RECORD.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, making this a special committee. There is a committee at this time, as appears from the resolution, engaged in investigating the construction of the Library building, and directed to inquire into and make report upon that subject. It is a matter of very great importance, involving many millions of dollars. The action of the House on several occasions in this matter, in connection with the sundry civil bill, shows that the House regards the situation as to that building as exceedingly grave and well worthy of the investigation that is going on. I think, sir, so far as appears to this House, that the conduct of the legislation creating that plan, and involving the persons named in connection with it, discloses one of the most shameful performances I have ever known in my experience in connection with public affairs in this country. Now, at this stage, one of the gentlemen who is under inquiry seems to have suggested—or at least his friend has thought proper to bring into this House a resolution investigating the action of members of Congress.

Mr. KELLEY. I beg leave to interrupt the gentleman there.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. This resolution is my own, and the result of my own cool, calm, and long-entertained purpose to have this country know some of the facts that came to my knowledge in the early days of this session. Mr. Smithmeyer nor any other man other than myself is responsible for the conception of the charge or the manner in which it has been made. I alone claim all the honor, and will assume all the discredit that may arise from it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I take it that the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is absolutely true——

Mr. KELLEY. It is.

Mr. BLOUNT. And as such I accept it as absolutely true. But I am not willing that at the very time this investigation is taking place of Mr. Smithmeyer and others connected with the building, that that committee shall now pause in their work and proceed to the investigation of the character and disreputable and dishonorable conduct of any member or members on this floor. That investigation should proceed steadily, and without any diversion to any other inquiry. If for any other purpose, sir, we should see fit to turn our attention to other investigations, or to an investigation in a new form, respecting the action of this House, or of any member of the House—no matter who else may be investigated, this pending investigation and inquiry should proceed without interruption or delay.

Again, sir, I think it is due to this House, I think it is due to any member who may be involved in the charges under this resolution, that the most prompt and thorough action should be taken in reference to the matter.

I am willing, and doubtless every other gentleman is willing, to act with the gentleman from Pennsylvania to ascertain whether or not there has been any improper action of any member of this House as indicated in this resolution; and if there is that the country should know it, and that this House shall take such action as shall purge its own honor. These resolutions are not connected at all. Investigating the contracts in connection with the building does not relate necessarily to any member of this House. The improper conduct of any member of this House in relation to it may stand by itself. It is a single allegation, and I will read it, sir:

Resolved, That the special committee engaged in investigating the construction of the new Library building be directed to inquire and report whether any member of the House acting by or for himself or in concert or combination with others has sought by persuasion, intimidation, or other corrupt or improper means to influence or control the action of Mr. J. L. Smithmeyer.

It goes, sir, to the dignity of this House. The Speaker has ruled it in order, as a matter of the highest privilege, and this House ought to treat it as that privilege suggests, affecting the integrity of the House; and therefore, sir, I hope that the House will see that a select special committee may be appointed that the country may see that this whole House is just as eager as the gentleman from Pennsylvania to have it investigated, to have action, and to let the country know all about it. I move, sir, that instead of it being referred to the existing special committee that the Chair be directed to appoint a committee of five members to investigate this allegation, and I move to strike out and insert so as to make it read as I have suggested.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves to amend the resolution by striking out so much of it as directs the existing committee to make the investigation, and substitute in lieu thereof that a special committee of five members be appointed.

Mr. HOLMAN. The hasty reading of this resolution and paper satisfies me that whoever investigates this subject will be compelled to go over much the same ground as that already gone over by the select committee appointed some months ago; and therefore I ask my friend, if he thinks it better to appoint another committee, that the testimony already taken before the Select Committee on the Library should be referred to the committee that he suggests.

Mr. BLOUNT. So much of it as relates to the object of this inquiry I think ought to be referred. It is a single question going to the integrity of the members on this floor. There is nothing that deserves the attention of this House more highly than that.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish my friend would pardon me for interrupting him there.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. He broadens my language to an extent that I have not contemplated when he makes it apply to members on this floor.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman is at no disadvantage, for I have read his resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must say to the gentleman from Georgia that I think that he will find that the testimony taken by the select committee, which is quite voluminous, ought to be before the committee which investigates the subject, as proposed by the pending resolution, to avoid delay of going over the same ground again. The proposed committee, I think, should have this testimony already taken referred to that committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would ask my friend what there is in the resolution, except that a certain member of this House is involved in the matter and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be prepared at the proper time to name the man.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Why should we not act upon it at once?

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say to my friend from Georgia that this Library controversy is a subject that I have had in some measure under investigation, and I ought to know a little about it, and my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] ought to know something about it, for he and I have been the only members that have been present when the body of the testimony was taken, so that all that will be necessary for him to accomplish his purpose, if he desires to have it sent to another committee, will be to have it added to this resolution that the testimony already taken before the present committee shall be transferred to that.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit me?

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has been very pleasant in his statement about me knowing all about the question and very modestly assumed that he knew a little about it. I have a very great respect for the gentleman from Indiana; but seemingly harsh speech even in him will not deter me from doing what seems to me a matter of duty.

Mr. HOLMAN. No word has been dropped from my lips that would justify the criticism that has been made by the gentleman from Georgia. I would not say a word that would be offensive to him. If I have said any offensive word I take it all back.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Indiana has charge of this investigation in the Library building and knows a little about it and all the circumstances, and he seems anxious to get at this investigation. Therefore I withdraw my proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, I disclaim that at once.

Mr. ROGERS. I renew it.

Mr. HOLMAN. On the contrary, I would be very glad to have the whole business turned over to some other committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. I withdraw my request to have a select committee appointed.

Mr. COX. I renew it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no doubt, sir—and I say it in all kindness—that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is more thoroughly informed in relation to this very matter than other members of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; I never heard an intimation of this before. What I have heard here is all I know of it.

Mr. BLOUNT. But my friend has said, and I have no doubt properly said, that with the knowledge he has of the investigation that is taking place, the facts in possession of his committee will have to be turned over to the new committee, and I take his meaning to be that this investigation is already actually pending before his committee. Therefore, having had that intimation from the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. HOLMAN. No, my friend misapprehends me. I never heard of this particular matter before. But I can see at once that to make the testimony upon this point applicable, it will be necessary for the committee which investigates the subject to go over ground which has been gone over already in the main in the other investigation.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, if I misapprehended my friend from Indiana, for whom we all have such great respect, in supposing him to mean that this very matter has incidentally come up before his own committee——

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him again? I meant simply to say that I can see from the reading of this paper and of the resolution that to reach the point involved here it would be necessary for the committee to go over the ground that has been gone over already by our committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. If that is all, then, Mr. Speaker, I submit my amendment to the House, and I now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. KELLEY. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman from Georgia has yielded to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] secured the floor and offered an amendment, and is, of course, entitled to the floor on that amendment, and he now yields to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, to illustrate the propriety, and the wisdom as well, of the resolution offered by my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], let me put the case in this way: Suppose it shall turn out that the member of this House who is sought to be investigated is a member of the special committee now conducting the Library investigation; we should then have the anomaly of the House of Representatives referring the subject-matter involving the conduct of a member of Congress to a committee of which that gentleman is a member, and we should have a member of this House acting upon a special committee to investigate himself! I insist, sir, that the proposition is an anomalous one, such as probably never has been presented before in the House. At all events, the member could not act with any degree of propriety or decency upon a committee which was investigating his own conduct.

Mr. CRAIN. Might not the same difficulty arise in the case of the appointment of a special committee, so long as the member to be investigated is not named?

Mr. ROGERS. In response to that, it is to be presumed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania who offers this resolution of investigation will advise the Speaker before the special committee is appointed of the name of the member proposed to be investigated, and it is to be presumed that the Speaker, in the organization of the special committee, will avoid the impropriety of placing upon it the member who is sought to be investigated. Now, I do not know that this point can have any application here, but if it should turn out in the way I have supposed, what position would the House be in, as well as the member involved?

Mr. CRAIN. The member would have to withdraw from the committee. That is all.

Mr. ROGERS. Again, Mr. Speaker, if it is important that the information already obtained by the committee which has been investigating the subject-matter of the Library should be in the possession of the committee making this special investigation, the Speaker, in the organization of the new committee, would doubtless leave off the member or members involved, so that the special committee would have the benefit of all the information that is now in possession of the old committee, and at the same time the difficulty I have pointed out would be avoided. Therefore, sir, as a matter of propriety and of correct action upon the part of the House, I claim that this special committee ought to be organized by the Speaker for the purpose of making this special investigation; and the Speaker in the exercise of his discretion and wisdom will doubtless appoint a committee which will make a proper and thorough investigation. I now yield the floor back to the gentleman from Georgia, if he desires it.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] seems to have lost his right to the floor by inadvertence, and I am not disposed to take any advantage of him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yielded to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], and thereupon the gentleman from Georgia offered an amendment to the resolution, and was of course entitled to the floor to speak to his amendment. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania as being still in control of the resolution and will recognize him when the gentleman from Georgia yields the floor.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] desires a few minutes, and I now yield to him such time as he wishes.

Mr. COX. Only a moment. It is very unfortunate that our Library building, or its construction, has been postponed by this untoward business. I would favor the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], because I am told that this inquiry involves some member of the House who is upon the committee of which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. I have not said so.

Mr. COX. It does not involve the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]; we all know that. [Laughter.] The name of the member it does involve is going around in the House in a gossipy way, and I am here to say for the man involved that he is entitled to a fair, clear, and complete opportunity to meet anything that may be brought against him.

I think a special committee will do that. In the making up of a special committee the Speaker will of course have in view the selection of those who are familiar with the subject, and will be likely to put upon the committee gentlemen who have already investigated matters which are cognate with it. I think, however, the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana is worthy of consideration; I mean his suggestion that all the testimony already taken be transferred to the special committee which I think this House will probably organize. I therefore move as an amendment——

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether he does not think it possible that the turning over of that testimony to this committee might disclose matters not connected with this second investigation and which ought not to be published at this time?

Mr. COX. So far as concerns the testimony to be turned over to the special committee, if it be appointed——

Mr. KELLEY. If I may be allowed, I think I can make a suggestion which will be satisfactory to both the gentlemen. Let the special committee be appointed, and let it be made the duty of the chairman of the existing committee to send the name and address of every witness that has been examined before that committee to the chairman of the new committee. This would give a clue to the sources of the evidence and to the people who are familiar with the business of this construction, while it would leave the new committee free to examine its own witnesses. The examinations of the committee already organized have gone on practically in private. An investigation touching the highest privilege of the House, because involving the character and integrity of a member thereof in his representative capacity, should be open. The party accused should be permitted to appear by counsel, and if need be the party making the arraignment should be allowed to conduct the investigation or name a competent person to do so.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me a moment?

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has the floor.

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] if I have the right to do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the first intimation I had that any gentleman connected with the committee was involved in any degree in the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. KELLEY. I beg the gentleman to believe that I have made no such suggestion.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is made at any rate by the gentleman from New York; and it is the first intimation I have had on that subject, beyond what has been whispered around the House during the last twenty minutes. Under these circumstances, I can see myself the propriety of appointing another committee; and I think that course ought to be pursued.

I wish to suggest, however, that the testimony already taken, in order to be valuable, must be connected with this inquiry. I think there will be no embarrassment whatever in making this resolution a little broader, so as to embrace the provisions of the original resolutions under which the existing committee was appointed, making both subjects a matter of inquiry, and adopting also an amendment transferring to this new committee the testimony heretofore taken, as the inquiry will cover, to a large extent, the same ground.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Is not your committee now investigating this man Smithmeyer in connection with charges of improper conduct on his part?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is investigating the general subject.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The impression in this House among many members is that this man Smithmeyer has been charged with improper conduct in regard to certain contracts—cement contracts and other contracts—and that your committee is now investigating him in connection with that matter. Are you not?

Mr. HOLMAN. The subject embraces that, undoubtedly.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Then the investigation now proposed would not involve a stoppage of the investigation now going on by your committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; but let me suggest——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The gentleman will pardon me. What I wanted to get at is that this man Smithmeyer shall not escape the investigation by raising a charge of this kind that one of the members has been following him up.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is manifest, as my friend from Missouri must concede, that if a member of the committee is involved in any charge of improper conduct, he ought not to act on the committee.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Certainly not.

Mr. HOLMAN. No matter who might be on the committee, a member under any charge of improper conduct of course should not be on the committee. So that you would have to reorganize the committee in any event. Therefore I think this whole matter should be transferred to another committee as proposed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has the floor.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] desires to ask a question.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I think it due to the House and the country, as well as to every individual member, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should name the member referred to in his resolution. I ask him to name that member.

Mr. KELLEY. When the House shall have taken action, when the committee shall have been appointed, and I shall have received notice when and where to meet it, I will make known the name of the person to whom I allude in that resolution—not until then.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. In the mean time injustice may be done to a great many members.

Mr. COX. I do not see any objection to having the testimony already taken which has reference to this very business transferred to this new committee in order that it may have access to it and obtain from it such data as may be pertinent.

Mr. KELLEY. One moment. The testimony taken does not relate to the question of the exercise or attempted exercise of improper influence by a member because the chairman of the committee, who has been present at all these meetings, says he had not heard such an intimation until he heard it from me on the floor. Therefore it is not the same question. They are investigating the methods of construction, good, bad, or indifferent, honest or dishonest; I allege that a member of this House has by improper conduct sought to control the material which should be put into that building, by influence, by favor or hostility.

Mr. OATES. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say——

Mr. COX. I will withdraw the amendment I intended to offer, but I think it is due to this House and due to members that the name of the man who is implicated should be revealed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McCLAMMY. If anybody has done anything let us know who it is.

Mr. KELLEY. In matters of this kind my judgment and conscience control me, and when the proper time comes to reveal the name I will do it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I demand the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have the floor. So far as the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is concerned that he will at the proper time reveal the name of the gentleman to whom he alludes, I think we can all afford to be content. I take it as a pledge which the gentleman will observe; and now in order that we may proceed to some other business I will yield the floor so the gentleman may ask for the previous question.

Mr. KELLEY. I demand the previous question.

Mr. OATES. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania this question. I understood him to state awhile ago that it was intended the member against whom this charge is made should be heard by counsel. Now, how can he appear by counsel when the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not give his name?

Mr. KELLEY. I say if the Chair will name the committee, if it is to be a special one, that as soon as the vote is taken and I shall be summoned I will give the name. If the business is to remain with the existing committee——

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the House will be informed just exactly what it is we are called upon to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the resolution again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. When the gentleman from Georgia withdrew his amendment for a special committee both the gentleman from New York and myself renewed it.

The SPEAKER. Both could not. The gentleman from New York renewed it, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I renewed it.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Georgia renewed his own motion.

The SPEAKER. Which was to strike out so much of the resolution as directs the existing committee to make the investigation and substitute in lieu thereof a special committee to consist of five members. The Chair did not understand the gentleman to renew it, but he states he did.

Mr. ROGERS. Hear me a moment. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. ROGERS. I wish to offer an amendment which I think the House will accept if it will hear it.

Mr. KELLEY. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ROGERS. We will amend it to suit ourselves. It does not suit me as it is.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes none.

So the previous question was ordered.

The question recurred on Mr. BLOUNT's amendment.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I trust my name will not be included in the number of the special committee to be appointed by the Speaker. I will have to appear before the committee, and therefore it is improper that I should be a member of it.

PUBLIC BUILDING, DETROIT.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9447) to restore certain money to the fund for erecting a public building at the city of Detroit, and put it upon its passage. I will say this does not take a penny out of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas two lots of land in the city of Detroit, Mich., contiguous to the present site of the post-office building in said city, were purchased by the Government as an addition to said site for the purpose of erecting a new public building thereon; and

Whereas the purchase-money paid for said lots was taken out of and deducted from the amount appropriated for the erection of said building in said city; and

Whereas the project of erecting said building on said lots has been abandoned, and other lots of land purchased for that purpose: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to sell said two lots of land for a sum at least equal to the purchase price paid by the Government therefor, and to restore to the appropriation for said public building the amount realized from said sale.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLAND. I think we had better have the report read.

The report (by Mr. NEWTON) was read, as follows:

The Treasury Department acquired two lots of land in the rear of the existing post-office in Detroit, for the purpose of erecting thereon a new public building. Afterwards a new site in a different part of the city was purchased and paid for, and the project of using the two lots and the old site abandoned. These two lots were paid for out of the appropriation to erect the new building at Detroit and cost $110,000, which the bill seeks to restore after sale of the abandoned lots or so much thereof as the lots may sell for. We have no doubt that that is just, and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to ask the gentleman what, independent of the two lots proposed to be sold, is the amount of the appropriation made for the erection of this building?

Mr. CHIPMAN. We had an appropriation in all of something over $1,200,000, in one way or another. Does the gentleman mean what is the limit of the cost?

Mr. BLAND. The total amount.

Mr. CHIPMAN. There was an appropriation of $500,000 originally, out of which they bought the two lots provided to be sold here, and afterwards abandoned the idea of using them.

Mr. BLAND. It is proposed to sell these lots and put the money in another public building?

Mr. CHIPMAN. No; you are mistaken. The money is to be devoted to the same building.

Mr. BLAND. Well, on the same lot.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Let me ask the gentleman if this does not amount to an appropriation of $500,000 additional.

Mr. CHIPMAN. No, sir.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. What is the value of these lots?

Mr. CHIPMAN. They paid $110,000 for the lots, and that amount was taken from the appropriation. Now we want to sell these lots and put the money back into the appropriation to be applied to the building.

Mr. COBB. When the act making the additional appropriation was passed, was not this purchase considered?

Mr. CHIPMAN. No, sir; it was taken out of the whole appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman how long it has been since these lots were purchased.

Mr. CHIPMAN. About three years.

Mr. HOLMAN. In that event, the purchase having been so long ago, it seems to me that this property should be sold under an appraisement, with the provision that it shall not be sold for less than the appraised value.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that. It is not necessary.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to ask a further question, whether or not this will increase the cost of the public building.

Mr. CHIPMAN. No; not one cent.

There being no objection, the bill was considered and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CHIPMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCREARY. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BRUMM. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRUMM. I call the attention of the House to the fact that some three months ago or more certain charges were made and statements by my colleague, Hon. WILLIAM L. SCOTT, as to the truth of a statement I had made, and a number of other statements. My colleague agreed to be here to-day, and I should like to know if he is in the Hall? I do not see him in his seat. If he is not present I shall of course defer what I am about to say, but give notice that I shall call it up the very first time I meet him in the House.

Mr. McCREARY. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask unanimous consent that members having reports to make may file them with the Clerk.

There was no objection.

Woodbridge; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (H. R. 8310) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Wallace military reservation, in Kansas.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills begins at twelve minutes after 1 o'clock, and the call rests with the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, which has an unfinished matter before the House.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] in charge of the pending bill is not in his seat at the moment, and I ask that the committee be passed over, retaining its right to the hour to which it is entitled.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What is the pending bill?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1548) to increase the efficiency of the medical division of the Pension Bureau.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no objection to the request.

There being no further objection, the request of Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER proceeded to call the committees.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the members generally understand the object of this call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated distinctly that this hour is set apart for the consideration of bills reported from committees, and that the call rested with the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, which thereupon was by unanimous consent passed without losing its right. The Chair is now calling the committees for presentation of bills for consideration.

Mr. HERBERT. I would like to ask if the Committee on Naval Affairs has been called?

The SPEAKER. Not this morning. The Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department has just been called.

ABOLITION OF CIRCUIT-COURT POWERS.

Mr. CULBERSON (when the Committee on the Judiciary was reached). I call up Senate bill 3234, a bill to abolish circuit-court powers of certain courts in the United States, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be, and is hereby, established a circuit court of the United States in and for the western district of Arkansas, for the northern district of Mississippi (and for the western district of South Carolina), respectively, as the said districts are now constituted by law. And said circuit courts, respectively, shall be held at the times and places now provided by law for the holding of the district courts in said districts, respectively, and also at Helena, in the eastern district of Arkansas, at the same time the district court is now held.

SEC. 2. That said circuit courts, respectively, shall have and exercise, within their respective districts, the same original and appellate jurisdiction as are or may be conferred by law upon the other circuit courts of the United States. And all suits, causes, and proceedings now pending in the said several respective district courts (and in the district court of the district of West Virginia), in and concerning which the said district courts exercise circuit-court powers, shall be transferred to and belong to the jurisdiction of said circuit courts, respectively, and shall be proceeded with accordingly.

SEC. 3. That there shall be appointed for each of said circuit courts in this act mentioned, by the circuit-court judge of the circuit, a clerk, who shall take the oath and give the bond required by law for clerks of circuit courts, who shall discharge all the duties and be entitled to all the fees and emoluments prescribed by general law. And the United States marshals of said respective districts shall act as marshals of said circuit courts, and the United States district attorneys for said respective districts shall discharge the duties of said district attorneys in said circuit courts.

SEC. 4. That said circuit courts, respectively, shall have power to make such orders and directions as shall be proper for the transfer from said district courts of all causes, proceedings, matters, records, files, and papers as by force of this act should belong to the said circuit courts.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of the act entitled "An act to amend sections 533, 556, 571, and 572 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to courts in Arkansas and other States," approved January 31, 1877, conferring upon the district court for the eastern district of Arkansas, held at Helena, circuit-court powers, and section 571 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, repealed: and all causes, suits, proceedings, records, files, and papers in matters now pending in such district court at Helena (and in the district court of the district of West Virginia), in or under the exercise of circuit powers or jurisdiction, shall be removed and transferred to the circuit court for the eastern district of Arkansas (and for the district of West Virginia, respectively,) in the same manner and with the same effect as is hereinbefore in this act provided in respect of said other districts.

SEC. 6. That whenever grand or petit jurors are summoned for service in said courts in said respective districts in this act named they shall be the grand and petit jurors for both said circuit and district courts so held at the same time and place.

The amendment proposed by the committee was read, as follows:

That hereafter in all cases tried before any circuit court of the United States, or before any district court having circuit powers, the judgment of such court may, upon the application of the defendant, be re-examined and reversed or affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error, granted under such rules and regulations as said court may prescribe.

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. In redraughting this substitute by inadvertence I left out the word "capital" before the word "cases" in the first line, and in order that the bill may be presented properly to the House, I ask that that be inserted.

The amendment to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. The purpose of the Judiciary Committee was to substitute this single section for the Senate bill, and if the section as it would now read is not explicit enough as an explanation, then I will explain anything further that may be necessary; but unless some one asks for it, I hope the House will now take a vote.

Mr. BLAND. I think we ought to have the bill explained.

Mr. ROGERS. Very well. This is the same question which was up some time ago, when the House provided for an appeal from circuit courts and from district courts exercising certain powers in capital cases, so that when parties are tried for capital offenses and are sentenced to be condemned to death they may as a matter of right have a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States for the purpose of reviewing the law. That is all there is in the bill. I do not know of but one thing that need be mentioned in addition to that, and that is this: As to the probable increase of cases that might reach the Supreme Court, I think they would probably be forty in the course of the year, possibly half of that number; and as between the increase of that business and the humanity that is embraced in this bill it does seem to me that the humanity ought to prevail. I have always held that no man ought to be condemned to death in any country without having a writ to some supreme court to review the law other than that which has passed upon his case at nisi prius. The writs of error will be provided under this bill in the same way as now provided for in all other cases.

The amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to; the bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROGERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL MODE OF TAKING DEPOSITIONS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I now call up the bill (S. 832) to provide an additional mode of taking depositions of witnesses in causes pending in the courts of the United States.

Mr. BRUMM. I rise to a privileged question. If the Chair will remember, before the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas was made, which was in order, I rose and I simply wanted the Chair to indicate and ask the gentleman whether he intended to make such a motion. I was willing to let the gentleman do that; and then the Chair recognized the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he desires to interrupt the proceedings during this hour for the consideration of bills.

Mr. BRUMM. I do not, if I may be recognized after this hour is passed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call up Senate bill 832.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in addition to the mode of taking the depositions of witnesses under dedimus potestatem or otherwise now provided by law, in causes pending at law in the district and circuit courts of the United States, it shall be lawful for such courts to make rules and regulations allowing the taking of depositions or testimony under dedimus potestatem or otherwise as near as may be, according to the mode prescribed by the laws of the State in which the courts are held.

The amendment offered by the committee was read, as follows:

That in addition to the mode of taking depositions of witnesses in causes pending at law or in equity in the district and circuit courts of the United States it shall be lawful to take depositions or testimony of witnesses in the mode prescribed by the laws of the State in which the courts are held.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

Mr. OATES. I will ask that the report be read. It is very short, and it states the fact as well as I could.

The report (by Mr. OATES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 832) to provide an additional mode of taking depositions of witnesses in causes pending in the courts of the United States, having had the same under consideration, report:

The main purpose of the bill is to invest the district and circuit courts of the United States with the discretion of making rules for the taking of depositions of witnesses in causes at law pending in their respective courts independent of the method prescribed by the United States statutes, and the latter part of the bill, which prescribes that these rules, as near as may be, shall conform to the laws of the States in which such courts are held, is merely directory and not obligatory; in other words, if enacted into law its only effect would be to invest the courts with power and authority, in their discretion, to make whatever rules they deem proper for the taking of depositions of witnesses in cases at law. It follows, that under its provisions two district courts in the same State might have different rules, or a district and a circuit court held at the same place might have different rules touching the same subject-matter, which might produce great confusion, uncertainty, and inconvenience.

Your committee therefore recommend that said bill be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the following:

"That in addition to the mode of taking depositions of witnesses in causes pending at law or in equity in the district and circuit courts of the United States, it shall be lawful to take the depositions or testimony of witnesses in the mode prescribed by the laws of the State in which the courts are held."

And thus amended your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. OATES. The report explains the necessity for the passage of this bill and for the amendments submitted. It points out the objection to the bill as passed by the Senate, and I ask that the bill be put on its third reading and passage.

The amendment of the committee was adopted.

Mr. MACDONALD. I wanted to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if the object of this substitute is to secure uniformity in taking testimony.

Mr. OATES. It is to secure uniformity and provide an additional mode.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OATES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. OATES. I think it would be proper to ask a conference with the Senate on this matter, because the House passed a bill similar to this before and there is a manifest disagreement. I will therefore inquire if it is in order to ask a conference with the Senate. This is an amendment of their bill by striking out all after the enacting clause. It will come to that in the end, and that is the reason why I ask the committee on conference now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks that the House insist upon its amendment to the Senate bill and request a conference with the Senate. If there be no objection, the conferees will be appointed during the day.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REFUND OF ADDITIONAL TOBACCO TAX.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call up the bill (H. R. 11258) for the relief of certain persons who paid additional taxes assessed against them under the act of March 3, 1875. This bill has been upon the Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. I will state it is a very short bill.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, within two years after the approval of this act, to pay to any persons who may present their claims to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue such sums of money, respectively, as they shall show to said Commissioner to have been severally paid by them, or the persons whom they legally represent, as an additional tax on tobacco, cigars, or cigarettes, which they sold or removed for sale or consumption, on the 3d day of March, 1875.

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield the floor to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina) is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11039) for the relief of certain persons who paid additional taxes assessed against them under the act of March 3, 1875, submit the following report:

An act of Congress of March 3, 1875, increased the internal-revenue tax on tobacco from 20 cents to 24 cents per pound. The law contained the express proviso that it "shall not apply to tobacco on which the tax under existing laws shall have been paid when this act takes effect." A great many persons purchased stamps to pay all the taxes which had accrued on their tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes, but did not affix the stamps to the same until March 3, 1875. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue ruled that there were no fractions of a day and that the stamps must have been affixed at or before midnight of March 2. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue estimates the amount of tax to be refunded, in case this bill becomes a law, at not exceeding $100,000, and he suggests certain changes in the bill which have been concurred in by the committee. In accordance therewith the committee recommend the adoption of the accompanying substitute and that the original bill (H. R. 11039) do lie upon the table.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL I. GUSTIN.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call up bill H. R. 10919, to make valid a deed to a certain tract of land in Bibb County, Georgia, made and delivered by Brig. Gen. Davis Tilson, acting assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, to Samuel I. Gustin, his heirs and assigns, and I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the title conveyed by deed from Davis Tilson, brigadier-general of volunteers and acting assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, on the 27th day of April, 1866, to Samuel I. Gustin, of the county of Bibb, State of Georgia, to 4 acres 1 rod and 10 perches of land situated in said county and State, being a part of the 20-acre lot number 8 in the Macon reserve, west of the Ocmulgee River, and further known as a part of that portion of said lot which H. I. Peters and Jacob Russell deeded to Samuel P. Moore in his capacity of surgeon-general of the Confederate States, is hereby confirmed to, and whatever right or interest which the United States may be supposed to have in said described tract of land is hereby granted and released to the said Samuel I. Gustin, his heirs or assigns.

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws militating against this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield now to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to explain very briefly the object of this bill. During the existence of the Confederate government, it purchased a tract of land in Bibb County for the purposes of an arsenal. After the close of the war the property was taken charge of by the Freedmen's Bureau, and later General Tilson, who was acting assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, made a deed of the property to Mr. Gustin. The question has arisen as to the authority of General Tilson to make that deed. The Government has the money which was paid for the property, and the present owners simply desire to have the deed made by General Tilson validated by this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURT AT JOHNSON CITY, TENN.

Mr. CULBERSON. I now call up a bill (H. R. 11087) to establish a circuit and district court at Johnson City, Tenn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That bill, the Chair is informed, is upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CULBERSON. It ought to be upon the House Calendar, and I now ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House as in committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a term of the circuit court and of the district court for the eastern district of Tennessee shall be held at Johnson City, in said State, in each year, on the first Mondays of May and November after the passage of this act. That the said courts shall be known as the mountain division of the eastern district of Tennessee, and shall consist of the following counties, to wit: Johnson, Carter, Unicoi, Sullivan, Washington, Greene, Hawkins, and Hancock; but no additional clerk or marshal shall be appointed in said district. That said courts shall be held by the circuit and district judges now assigned to hold the courts of the eastern district of Tennessee.

SEC. 2. That the clerks of the circuit and district courts of the eastern district of Tennessee, and the marshal and district attorney for said district, shall perform the duties pertaining to their offices, respectively, for said courts; and the said clerks and marshals shall each appoint a deputy to reside and keep their offices in the said Johnson City, and who shall, in the absence of their principals, do and perform all the duties appertaining to their offices, respectively.

SEC. 3. That all suits not of a local nature in the circuit and district courts against a single defendant, inhabitant of said State, must be brought in the division of the district where he resides; but if there are two or more defendants residing in different divisions of the district such suits may be brought in either division. All issues of fact in said suit shall be tried at a term of the court held in the division where the suit is so brought.

SEC. 4. That all prosecutions for crimes or offenses heretofore committed in any of the counties composing said mountain division shall be tried at Knoxville, as now provided; but all crimes or offenses hereafter committed in any of the counties composing said mountain division shall be cognizable within said mountain division. That all grand and petit jurors summoned to attend for service in said division shall be residents of the same.

SEC. 5. That all cases of removal of suits from the courts of the State of Tennessee to the courts of the United States in the eastern district of Tennessee such removal shall be to the United States court in the division in which the county is situated from which the removal is made, and the time within which the removal shall be perfected, in so far as it refers to or is regulated by the terms of the United States courts, shall be deemed to refer to the terms of the United States courts in such division. That each of said courts shall be held in a building to be provided for that purpose by the State or municipal authorities, and without expense to the United States.

SEC. 6. That this act shall be in force from and after the 1st day of May, A. D. 1889; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. BUTLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WITNESSES IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call up the bill (H. R. 10182) to amend an act entitled "An act to make persons charged with crimes and offenses competent witnesses in the United States and Territorial courts."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to make persons charged with crimes and offenses competent witnesses in the United States and Territorial courts," approved March 16, 1878, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows, to wit: By adding thereto the following words: "And no person shall be disqualified as a witness in any criminal prosecution by reason of his interest in the event of the same as a party or otherwise, or by reason of his conviction of any crime, but such interest or conviction may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credibility."

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, the bill, I think, explains itself, and I move that it be put upon its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROGERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEALERS IN COUNTERFEIT MONEY.

Mr. CULBERSON. I now call up the bill (H. R. 9268) to punish dealers and pretended dealers in counterfeit money and other fraudulent devices for using the United States mails, and I yield to Mr. SENEY.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, in any post-office, letter-box, or other receptable for the United States mail, any letter, circular, or other communication addressed to any other person, offering or proposing to sell, give, deliver, or transfer, to any person, any imitation of any coin, bill, note, bond, or other security of the United States, or bank notes, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 and by imprisonment at hard labor for not more than three years.

Mr. SENEY. I move that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SENEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call up the bill (H. R. 8344) to prevent cruelty to domestic animals.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc, That any person within the District of Columbia or Territories of the United States who overrides, overdrives, overloads, drives when overloaded, tortures, torments, deprives of necessary sustenance, cruelly beats, mutilates, or cruelly kills, or causes or procures to be overridden, overdriven, overloaded, driven when overloaded, tortured, tormented, deprived of necessary sustenance, cruelly beaten, mutilated, or cruelly killed, any domestic animal, and whoever, having the charge or custody of any such animal, either as owner or otherwise, inflicts unnecessary cruelty upon the same, or fails to provide the same with proper food, drink, or protection from the weather, or cruelly drives the same when unfit for labor, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and must, on conviction, be fined not exceeding $100, and, upon failure to pay the same and cost, shall be imprisoned or sentenced to hard labor for not exceeding one hundred days.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of any officer of the law, and shall be lawful for any other person, to arrest and take before any commissioner, judge, or justice of the peace any person violating the provisions of this act, and upon the conviction of the person so arrested, the officer or person making the arrest shall be entitled to $3, to be taxed and collected as a part of the cost; and any executive officer of the District of Columbia or Territories of the United States, who fails or neglects to arrest any person who violates any of the provisions of this act in his presence, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not exceeding $100, and, on failure to pay it, shall be liable to removal from his office.

The committee recommended amendments as follows:

Between the words "who" and "overrides," in line 4, of section 1, insert the following: "Individually or as member or employé of any corporation."

Also amend section 2 by inserting between the words "act" and "and," in line 4, the following: "Whereupon such proceedings shall be had as in other cases of misdemeanor."

And thus amended your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, those who have listened to the reading of the bill certainly understand it, and I do not believe that any one can make any objection to it. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to offer an amendment to that bill. I think the greatest cruelty to animals that is practiced in this city is perpetrated by the street car companies in attaching but one horse to a street car, and there is no way of preventing cruelty to animals while that is permitted to continue. I would, therefore, make it unlawful and punishable, and I desire to offer an amendment to cover that point.

Mr. OATES. If the bill does not cover just such cases as that, then the Judiciary Committee can not prepare one that does. If the gentleman will examine the bill he will see that overloading and overdriving are expressly mentioned.

Mr. BLAND. But I want the bill to mention this expressly as being a case of overloading and overdriving. In this city I have seen one horse attached to a street car, driven along and whipped until the poor animal fell dead. It is a disgrace to Congress that such things should take place. I think this is the time and the place to make it unlawful to drive a street car on any of these roads with less than two horses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that the bill is open to amendment. The Clerk will read the report of the committee which submits, as the Chair is informed, several amendments.

The report (by Mr. OATES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House bill 8344, having had the same under consideration, report the same back with amendments, as follows:

Between the words "who" and "overrides," in line 4 of section 1, insert the following: "Individually or as member or employé of any corporation."

Also amend section 2 by inserting between the words "act" and "and," in line 4, the following: "Whereupon such proceedings shall be had as in other cases of misdemeanor."

And thus amended your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

It shows upon its face that its purpose is to prevent by adequate punishments cruelty to domestic animals, and defines with accuracy and certainty what shall be considered cruelty and the mode and measure of punishment. To inflict cruelty upon domestic animals is an act so mean and despicable that it needs no further comment or argument to sustain this bill. Some humanitarians think that the criminal laws should be so extended as to prevent cruelty to all animals, those which are ferœ naturœ as well as domestic, which might be very tough on huntsmen.

Your committee think that this bill goes far enough.

Mr. OATES. I ask a vote on the amendments of the committee.

The amendments stated in the report were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri will now send up his amendment.

Mr. BLAND. I move to amend by adding to the bill the clause which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And it shall be conclusive evidence of overloading to drive less than two horses to one car in the District of Columbia; and the using of less than two horses is hereby declared unlawful.

Mr. BLAND. Now, Mr. Speaker, under this amendment there can be no mistake about the law and the evidence of its violation.

Mr. OATES. I quite agree with the gentleman from Missouri that the case he intends to cover, if it be that of overloading, is one of cruelty; but it is amply provided for in the bill, which is general in its provisions, while the amendment is in the nature of mere local legislation, a species of legislation which is frequently the subject of condemnation by the courts, especially when framed in severe and harsh terms, which it is not best to adopt except where absolutely necessary. I would like the gentleman from Missouri to withdraw his amendment, because the case which he really intends to cover is, in my opinion and in the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary, covered fully by the bill. The measure of evidence provided in the amendment is improper legislation. I will state, for the information of the gentleman and the House, that this question was raised in the committee when the bill first came up for consideration on the first report of the subcommittee, and it was re-referred to the subcommittee for investigation, and the amendments which have been adopted were the result.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BREWER addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan in a moment.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, this bill, it is true, is general in its character. So far as this District is concerned, and so far as concerns the question of using one horse or two horses for the drawing of a street car in this District, it is so general that it will be of no effect unless this amendment be adopted. The amendment makes it perfectly clear that the use of less than two horses to a car shall be unlawful; it makes this fact indisputable evidence of overloading. It is a shame and an outrage that Congress for the last twenty years has permitted this cruelty to animals as well as cruelty to the public on the part of these street-car companies.

Mr. OATES. I move the previous question on the pending amendment and on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BREWER addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] had not yielded the floor, and now calls the previous question.

Mr. CASWELL. The only way to pass this bill is to do it instantly, as in a few minutes the hour will expire.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. BLAND was adopted, there being—ayes 21, noes 19.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OATES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT AND CIRCUIT COURTS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call up the bill (H. R. 1873) to limit the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the district and circuit courts of the United States shall not take original cognizance of any suit of a civil nature, either at common law or in equity, between a corporation created or organized by or under the laws of any State and a citizen of any State in which such corporation at the time the cause of action accrued may have been carrying on any business authorized by the law creating it, except in cases arising under the patent or copyright laws, and in like cases in which said courts are authorized by this act to take original cognizance of suits between citizens of the same State; nor shall any such suit between such a corporation and a citizen or citizens of a State in which it may be doing business be removed to any circuit court of the United States, except in like cases in which such removal is authorized by the foregoing provision in suits between citizens of the same State.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary were read, as follows:

In line 11 strike out the words "by this act."

In lines 16 and 17 strike out the words "foregoing provision" and insert "existing law."

Mr. ADAMS. I wish the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] would ask unanimous consent that the hour, which is now within a few minutes of its expiration, be considered as having expired, so that we may discuss this bill to-morrow. It is a very important subject and will occupy considerable time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is but one minute of the hour remaining.

Mr. CULBERSON. This is a very important bill, and I am perfectly willing to accede to the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the report may be printed in the RECORD, so that gentlemen may examine it.

Mr. ADAMS. That is right; and let the views of the minority of the committee be also printed.

Mr. ROGERS. Let the majority and the minority report be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that the report of the committee and the views of the minority on this bill be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had House bill No. 1873 under consideration, recommend its passage with the following amendments:

1. Strike out the words "by this act," in the eleventh line.

2. Strike out the words "foregoing provision," in the sixteenth and seventeenth lines, and insert in their stead the words "existing law."

The object of this bill is not to interfere with the privilege of corporations to bring suits in the United States courts in cases arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States or treaties made by their authority, but to withdraw jurisdiction from the district and circuit courts of the United States of any suit of a civil nature at law or in equity between a corporation created under the laws of any State and a citizen of any State in which such corporation at the time the cause of action accrued may have been carrying on any business authorized by the law creating it.

The committee believe that a corporation that pursues its business in a State or States other than that in which it was organized ought to be regarded as a citizen of such State or States for judicial purposes.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The effect of this bill if enacted into law would be that a corporation organized under the laws of Massachusetts, which at the time when the cause of action accrued was carrying on in the State of Missouri any business authorized by its charter, could not sue a citizen of Missouri in the Federal courts.

It need not appear, in order to give the act effect and compel the dismissal of a suit for want of jurisdiction, that the corporation was carrying on any business in Missouri at the time when the suit was commenced; it may have been a stranger in Missouri for years; nor need it appear that it has ever carried on business in the district where the suit is brought; its business and agency may have been in a different part of the State. Yet it could not maintain a suit in the Federal courts.

Nor is there any definition in the act of the phrase "carrying on any business." The phrase is so general that the act would practically amount to an exclusion of corporations from the Federal courts in suits where the ground of jurisdiction is that the suit is a controversy between citizens of different States. Even if the phrase "carrying on any business" were to be strictly construed to be the keeping an office and local agents in the State where the defendant resides, there appears to be no sound reason why the Federal courts should be closed against a non-resident corporation having a resident agency, while they are open to non-resident corporations not having such an agency, and to non-resident partnerships and individuals whether they have a like resident agency or not.

The purpose of the constitutional provision that the judicial power shall extend to controversies between citizens of different States was to protect the non-resident litigant against local prejudice. How far this protection is needed we need not discuss.

If it is not needed at all, we might as well take away from Federal jurisdiction all controversies between citizens of different States.

If it is needed by any non-resident litigant it is surely needed as much by a non-resident corporation as by a non-resident partnership firm or a non-resident individual. The dangerous aggregations of corporate power which have in many instances occurred in this country ought not to make us forget that in a large majority of cases the formation of manufacturing and other business corporations has been a benefit to the country. If it were not so they would not be authorized by State laws. In a large majority of cases they are formed by citizens of the State under the laws of which they are organized, and their principal office is in that State, although they are obliged to some extent to carry on business in other States. They can not be formed except under the laws of some State, and they can not do business in any other State except by permission of its Legislature and under such conditions as it may see fit to impose. If they are allowed to carry on business in a State in which they do not reside, they should have the same right to resort to the Federal courts which other non-residents have.

The only valid and reasonable objection which any litigant can have to being impleaded in a Federal rather than in a State court is the greater expense attending litigation in the former and the greater distance which parties and witnesses have to travel in order to attend court. These evils exist to the same extent in cases in which the plaintiff is a non-resident individual as in those in which the plaintiff is a non-resident corporation. The evil should be remedied by more stringent regulations of fees and by providing for terms of court to be held in different parts of the district rather than by the sweeping provisions of the pending bill, which deny the protection of the Federal courts to that particular class of litigants which more than all others stands in need of it.

There is a larger question involved in the pending bill into which it is unnecessary to go further than to express a doubt. It is the question of constitutional power. A Massachusetts corporation, having a local agency in Missouri, would still be a citizen of Massachusetts, notwithstanding the enactment of the pending bill.

A controversy between it and a citizen of Missouri would still be, in the language of the Constitution, a controversy between citizens of different States.

Has Congress the constitutional power to close the Federal courts sitting in one State against a particular class of citizens of other States?

G. E. ADAMS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees has now expired.

DEPOSITIONS IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER (having resumed the chair) announced the appointment of Mr. OATES, Mr. CULBERSON, and Mr. CASWELL as conferees on the part of the House on the bill (S. 832) to provide an additional mode of taking depositions of witnesses in causes pending in the courts of the United States.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to present a conference report on the Army appropriation bill.

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$42,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

R. W. TOWNSHEND,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. ALLISON,
P. B. PLUMB,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In order to save the time of the House I will say it will be unnecessary to read the statement accompanying the report, as it has already been printed in the RECORD. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD to accompany the report.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The statement is as follows:

R. W. TOWNSHEND.
JOSEPH D. SAYERS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will say the conferees agree upon all matters with the exception of three amendments, numbered 32, 33, and 35, relating to gun factory and ordnance, and without further statements I move that the report be adopted.

The report was adopted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now move that the House further insist on the amendments numbered 32, 33, and 35, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will be absent from the city some days, and ask that some other member shall be substituted on the conference on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will substitute for the gentleman from Illinois on the House conferees the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAISH].

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. McCREARY. House bill 11309 has been set down as the special order for to-day, and I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. BRUMM. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. McCREARY. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will postpone it until to-morrow morning. We have already had one question of privilege to-day, and if the gentleman will postpone his question of privilege I will take up the bill I have indicated and proceed to its consideration.

Mr. BRUMM. Provided my colleague [Mr. SCOTT] is here and is willing, I do not object.

Mr. SCOTT. I would gladly do as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] desires me to do in this matter, but if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] confines himself strictly to the issue he proposes to raise, the question between him and myself can be disposed of in fifteen minutes.

During my absence from the House, in consequence of sickness, I have received from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] three notices, stamped with a 10-cent postage-stamp on each of them. [Laughter.] I must be present in the House to answer what he proposes to bring up here this morning. Now, unfortunately, I can not wait forever to meet the charges of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and if he confines himself strictly to the point he should confine himself to for ten minutes it will be time enough to do all we have got to do.

Mr. BRUMM. I shall follow my own judgment and not that of the gentleman.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] whether he expects to be here in the morning?

Mr. SCOTT. I do.

Mr. McCREARY. Then let it go over until then.

FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. McCREARY. I call up the bill which is the special order for this time, and I ask that it be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to empower the President to carry out the purposes of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President may deem it his duty to exercise any of the powers given to him by an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, it shall be lawful for the President, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to suspend, in whole or in part, the transportation across the territory of the United States, in bond and without the payment of duty, of goods, wares, and merchandise imported or exported from any foreign country from or to the British dominions in North America.

SEC. 2. That whenever the President shall be satisfied that there is any discrimination whatever in the use of the Welland Canal, the St. Lawrence River Canals, the Chambly Canal, or either of them, whether by tolls, drawbacks, refund of tolls, or otherwise, which is, or may be, detrimental to the interests of the United States, or any of its citizens, it shall be lawful for the President, in his discretion, to issue a proclamation to that effect, whereupon there shall be collected a toll of 20 cents a ton upon every foreign vessel and her cargo passing through either the Sault Ste. Marie Canal or the St. Clair Flats Canal; and the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize and direct any of the customs officers to collect the tolls levied under this act, or the President may, in his discretion, when he is satisfied there is any such discrimination, prohibit the use of said canals to any such foreign vessel. The President, when satisfied that such discrimination has ceased, may issue his proclamation to that effect, in his discretion, whereupon the tolls authorized by this act shall no longer be collected, and said prohibition, if ordered, shall cease.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make any regulations needful to carry this act into effect.

Mr. SPRINGER. I find the bill under consideration will be considered to-day and to-morrow. After that I understand the appropriation bill will be pressed on Friday and Saturday and taking up all the week. And I wish to state to the friends of the Oklahoma bill it will be impossible to reach it before Tuesday next, when I will call it up.

Mr. HOOKER. I give the gentleman notice we will not take it up during his absence. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Speaker, the measure which has just been called up for our consideration is one in which I, in common with all members upon this floor, take a very deep interest. I do so particularly because during the last Congress I introduced and reported to the House a bill of similar purport, which was adopted by the House with but a single dissenting voice.

When the message of the President of the United States was received I was absent; and the Committee on Foreign Affairs very properly, in the discharge of its duty, at once proceeded upon the consideration of the message and the preparation of a report to the House. Upon my return I thought it but right and proper that the special committee having this matter in charge should report it to the House; and I requested my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], so to do, knowing that the bill would thus be in excellent hands. I shall take occasion during the course of the debate to give my most hearty co-operation in securing a speedy passage of the bill by the House.

I deem this statement due to the House and to myself in connection with the matter. [Applause.]

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, the message of the President, sent to the Congress of the United States on the 23d day of August, 1888, places the Administration in a firm and courageous attitude on the fisheries controversy with Great Britain. It is dignified, resolute, and courteous, and presents a course of action for our Government that is worthy of the approval and support of the American people.

While it may have caused some persons to sulk like Achilles, and others, like Thersites, to indulge in vituperation and abuse, the general sentiment of the public is that the President should be upheld in his efforts to preserve the honor and dignity of our country, and protect and maintain the rights and interests of the people.

This message and the tariff message of President Cleveland should be recorded together in the history of our country. One seeks to reduce taxes and lighten the burdens of the people. The other seeks to maintain the rights and the dignity of American citizens, and both will be remembered forever.

Prompted by a patriotic purpose and a desire to settle all disputed questions, he opened negotiations and concluded a treaty with Great Britain, as was his constitutional privilege and duty, and submitted it to the United States Senate on the 20th day of February, 1888, for ratification.

This was the proper course. The course which intelligent and enlightened opinion everywhere sustains.

If the President had resorted to retaliatory measures against Canadian citizens, under the act of March 3, 1887, without having attempted negotiations with Great Britain, he would have been criticised, perhaps censured, for having failed to make proper efforts for a settlement with Great Britain through the treaty-making power.

The treaty, so carefully prepared by able and accomplished gentlemen under the direction and authority of the President, which provided for a settlement of all disputed questions that have been under discussion by the two governments, and which added greatly to the privileges of our fishermen in British American ports, was rejected by the unanimous vote of the Republican Senators, without any effort to recast or amend it.

While the motive that prompted this action may not be properly understood, it was equivalent to giving notice to the President and to the country that no treaty which could be negotiated in regard to Canadian troubles would be deemed sufficient by them, and that the time for treaty negotiations had passed and retaliation must commence.

There is nothing left the President now but retaliation. But this is no new issue. The policy he now proposes is substantially the policy decided on by him a year and a half ago, and which was practically indorsed by Congress when the act of March 3, 1887, was passed.

Without giving the details of all the negotiations between the United States and Great Britain in the past, it is proper to a satisfactory understanding of the questions involved that a brief reference should be made to treaties ratified by the two governments. There have been twenty-five treaties made between the United States and Great Britain, as follows:

1783—Treaty of independence.
1794—Commercial treaty.
1796—Treaty explaining a provision of treaty of 1784.
1798—Treaty explaining fifth article of treaty of 1784.
1802—Thomas Jefferson made a treaty with England explaining treaty of 1794, and annulled one article of it.
1814—Treaty of peace, negotiated on the part of the United States by Henry Clay, Jonathan Russell, Albert Gallatin, John Quincy Adams, and J. A. Bayard.
1815—Treaty of commerce.
1817—Treaty in relation to the naval forces to be placed on the Great Lakes, Ontario, Erie, etc.
1818—Fisheries treaty, negotiated by Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Rush.
1826—Treaty in regard to the award of the Emperor of Russia about slaves.
1827—Treaty about Oregon.
1827—Second treaty, continuing in force for ten years longer the commercial treaty of 1815.
1827—Third treaty, relating to the northeastern boundary.
1842—Treaty relating to the northern boundary and to the St. Lawrence, St. John, and Detroit Rivers.
1846—Treaty settling the boundary of Oregon, negotiated by James Buchanan.
1850—Clayton-Bulwer treaty.
1853—Treaty for settlement of claims.
1854—Reciprocity treaty with Canada.
1854—Second treaty, extending the duration of a commission previously provided for.
1862—Treaty relating to the suppression of African slave-trade.
1863—Treaty adding another article to the slave-trade treaty of 1862.
1863—Second treaty, to settle claims of Hudson Bay and Puget Sound Agricultural Company against the United States.
1870—Treaty relating to the African slave-trade.
1871, May 5—Treaty in regard to naturalization.
1871, July 4—Treaty for the settlement of the Alabama claims, the fisheries, reciprocity, and the boundary line between the United States and British Provinces.
1888—Treaty transmitted to the United States Senate February 20, 1888, and rejected by the Senate.

I only propose to discuss the treaties of 1783, 1818, 1854, and 1871, for these are the only treaties made between the United States and Great Britain which bear upon the questions under consideration.

Before the revolution of 1776 the inhabitants of all the British colonies in North America possessed the common right of fishing on all the coasts of British North America. At the end of the revolution the treaty of peace, made in 1783, defined the area of American fisheries and fixed the boundaries between the British provinces and the United States.

Its third article declared:

It is agreed that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank and on all the other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish, and also that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use (but not to dry or cure the same on that island), and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America.

The rights and liberties thus set forth, continued down to the war of 1812 and to the treaty of peace negotiated at Ghent, which closed the war on the 24th day of December, 1814, between the United States and Great Britain.

This treaty of peace provided:

First. For a restoration to each party of all countries, territories, etc., taken by either party during the war, without delay, saving some questions of islands in the Bay of Passamaquoddy.

Second. It provided for disposition of prizes and prisoners of war.

Third. It provided for questions of boundary and dominion regarding certain islands, and for the settlement of the northeastern boundary and also for the northwestern boundary, etc., but it made no reference whatever to fisheries questions.

Soon after the treaty of Ghent the British Government announced its purpose to exclude American fishermen from the liberty of fishing within one marine league of her shores in North America, and of drying and curing fish on the unsettled parts of those territories, and asserted that the fishing rights, recognized and secured to the citizens of the United States by the treaty of 1783, had become abrogated in consequence of the war of 1812. This assertion led to the treaty of the 20th of November, 1818, the fisheries article of which provided (Article I):

Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands; on the western and northwestern coast of Newfoundland from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company; and that the American fishermen shall also have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, above described, and of the coast of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground. And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

From 1818 forward, for a number of years, peace and neighborly feeling seemed to reign supreme, and no serious difficulties occurred as regards the rights of American fishermen in Canadian and American waters.

In 1854 a treaty was concluded by which exclusive reciprocity of trade was agreed on, and the right guarantied to the Americans to fish within the limits prohibited by the treaty of 1818, under various restrictions and limitations, and a similar right granted to British fishermen in certain waters of the United States.

This treaty contained other provisions respecting navigation of the St. Lawrence River and American and Canadian canals, and was terminable on notice after the expiration of ten years. It was not popular, and Congress terminated it in the session of 1864–'65 by a large majority in both the Senate and House of Representatives.

In 1868 serious trouble commenced because the Canadian Government enacted harsh and stringent laws on the subject of American fishermen calculated to cripple and destroy their operations.

Then came the treaty of 1871, concluded and signed at Washington and devoted primarily to the Alabama claims, but which also provided that for a period of ten years fishermen of the United States should have, in addition to their rights under the treaty of 1818, the right of British North American inshore fishing, under certain limitations, and the United States agreed to the free admission of British North American fishery products into our country, and it was also provided that the British fishermen might fish in certain American waters and that the balance of alleged advantage to the United States in these respects should be settled by a commission.

The award of this commission, known as the Halifax Commission, will probably never be forgotten in our country. By the vote of the British commissioner and of the Belgian umpire, and against the vote of the American commissioner, the sum required to be paid by the United States to Great Britain was fixed at $5,500,000. The gross injustice of this award strengthened the desire for a termination of these fishery arrangements by negotiations with the British Government to that end. Both Houses of Congress by joint resolutions, approved March 3, 1883, directed that notices be given of the termination of Articles XVIII, XIX, XX, XXI, XXII, XXIII, XXIV, XXV, and XXX of the treaty of Washington, which articles covered the whole fishery subject as well as certain matters of navigation; and Article XXXII was also terminated. By the proclamation of President Arthur, the termination took effect July 1, 1885. After the termination of the fisheries articles of the treaty of Washington, unfriendly coercion and harassment of American fishermen by Canadians were again resorted to with great exaggeration.

I shall not attempt to furnish lists of all the cases of warnings, seizures, fines, confiscations, searches, and captures that have been visited upon American fishermen. They have been very numerous and aggravated, and have cost our fishermen heavy expense and serious loss, and, as has been reported by a committee of Senators, these lists comprise in all nearly four hundred vessels that have been involved in seizures and other interferences growing out of disputed constructions of the treaty of 1818.

Only two weeks ago the American schooner Herman Sabson was seized and taken to St. John's, Newfoundland, and fined $100 for buying a few barrels of herring without license. The week before the steamer Novelty was refused permission to buy coal unless the captain paid $400 for a license.

Senator EDMUNDS said in his speech in the United States Senate:

It will be seen from the correspondence and papers submitted by the President in his message on the subject, of the 8th of December last, and from the testimony taken by the committee, that some of these instances of seizure or detention or of driving vessels away by threats, etc., were in clear violation of the treaty of 1818.

The people in Canada seem to be expecting retaliatory measures on our part. Hon. Mr. Laurier, leader of the Canadian Liberal party, in his speech at Toronto a few days since, declared that the United States had sufficient cause for retaliation in the action of Canada in the past. He said:

If the Canadian Government had followed a more friendly course there would not have been any unfriendly feeling to-day. Time and again in the year 1885 American fishermen were arrested for trivial offenses. * * * If the Canadian Government had administered our laws as they conceived them under the treaty, in a friendly manner, this could not have taken place. * * * It is high time we should reverse the policy we have been following toward the United States for the past twenty-five years.

The first step toward retaliation was taken in 1885. In his annual message of December, 1885, the President called the attention of Congress to the difficulties and disputes and harassments that have occurred, and Congress passed an act, which was approved by the President on the 3d of March, 1887, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels, in certain cases, and for other purposes." The act is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen, visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are or then lately have unjustly vexed or harrassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations, or requirements in respect of such rights; or otherwise unjustly vexed or harrassed in said waters, ports, or places; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places, in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harrassed in respect thereof, or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harrassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harrassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harrassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either or all of such cases, it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of, or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies, as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere; and also, to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish, or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. The President may, in his discretion, apply such proclamation to any part or to all of the foregoing-named subjects, and may revoke, qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act. Every violation of any such proclamation, or any part thereof, is hereby declared illegal, and all vessels and goods so coming, or being within the waters, ports, or places of the United States contrary to such proclamation shall be forfeited to the United States; and such forfeiture shall be enforced and proceeded upon in the same manner and with the same effect as in the case of vessels or goods whose importation or coming to or being in the waters or ports of the United States contrary to law may now be enforced and proceeded upon. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or such proclamation of the President made in pursuance hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

The President also in his message sent to Congress August 23, 1888, describes the situation fairly and forcibly, as follows:

Our citizens engaged in fishing enterprises in waters adjacent to Canada have been subjected to numerous vexatious interferences and annoyances, their vessels have been seized upon pretexts which appeared to be entirely inadmissible, and they have otherwise been treated by the Canadian authorities and officials in a manner inexcusably harsh and oppressive.

While keenly sensitive to all that was exasperating in the condition, and by no means indisposed to support the just complaints of our injured citizens, I still deemed it my duty, for the preservation of important American interests which were directly involved, and in view of all the details of the situation, to attempt by negotiation to remedy existing wrongs and to finally terminate, by a fair and just treaty, these ever-recurring causes of difficulty.

I fully believe that the treaty just rejected by the Senate was well suited to the exigency, and that its provisions were adequate for our security in the future from vexatious incidents and for the promotion of friendly neighborhood and intimacy, without sacrificing in the least our national pride or dignity.

It seems clear and conclusive that the time has arrived for action on the part of the United States Government. The rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels must be protected and a stop must be put to a discrimination in the use of certain Canadian canals, which is manifestly unjust and in violation of international agreement and comity. The pending bill provides the legislation now needed. I do not propose to speak at length on the merits of the fisheries question or to go into details that have puzzled and perplexed many of our ablest and best statesmen for near a century. It is sufficent for me to say that the two chief questions are: As to whether the expression "3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions" should be taken to mean a limit of 3 miles from the coast line, or a limit of 3 miles from a line drawn from headland to headland; and whether the proviso that "the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter, and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever," is intended to exclude American vessels from coming inshore to traffic, transship fish, purchase stores, hire seamen, etc.

Canadians, acting under the authority of a Dominion law and a proclamation issued March 5, 1886, by the minister of marine, which withdrew all commercial privileges thereafter from our fishing vessels except shelter, repairs, purchasing of wood, and obtaining water, have since that time seized every American fishing vessel which has entered Canadians waters, harbors, or ports for any purpose except these four, and have enforced their laws with so much rigor and, as Secretary Manning said, so great "brutality" as to practically deprive us of even these four conceded privileges. Instead of discussing the details of the fisheries dispute further, it is pertinent to this discussion for me to ask which nation first violated treaty stipulations. It is well known that Canada first violated the treaty stipulation entered into by the United States and Great Britain.

In the year 1886 notice was received by the representatives of our Government that our fishermen would no longer be allowed to ship their fish in bond, free of duty, from Canadian territories to this country. Since that time such shipment has always been denied.

On the 10th day of July, 1886, the Novelty, a duly registered steamvessel of the United States, was denied the right to take any steamcoal or purchase ice or transship any fish in bond to the United States, at Pictou, Nova Scotia.

Since 1866 free transit in bond has been allowed across our territory to goods arriving at our ports destined to Canada or exported from Canada to other foreign countries, and a profound sensation was produced when Great Britain excluded our fishermen from the privilege of shipping fish in bond, free of duty, from Canadian ports to this country, notwithstanding the privileges enjoyed by Canadian transport lines within our borders.

The great advantage derived by Canada is shown by the fact that $270,000,000 worth of Canadian merchandise has been carried in bond, free of duty, across our territory during the past six years, nearly all of which were goods dutiable under our tariff laws, and the larger part of this traffic consisted of exchanges of goods between Great Britain and her American provinces.

The bill now under consideration enlarges the power of the President, and authorizes him, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to suspend, in whole or in part, the transportation across the territory of the United States, in bond and without the payment of duty, all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported or exported from any foreign country, from or to the British dominions in North America. This is strong, appropriate, and comprehensive language, and the words are almost the same as those used by the President in his message.

It is asserted, however, by some that the President already has sufficient power conferred upon him by the act of March 3, 1887.

The answer to that is, that the act of 1887 does not go far enough, and does not confer sufficient authority on the President to meet the demands of the existing situation.

Under that act the President has the power, by proclamation, to deny vessels, their masters and their crews, of the British dominions of North America entrance into waters, ports, or places of or within the United States, and also to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States; but it does not authorize him, as the pending bill does, by proclamation to suspend in whole or in part the transportation in bond and without payment of duty of goods, wares, and merchandise imported or exported from any foreign country to or from the British dominions in North America across the territory of the United States, neither does it authorize him when there is discrimination in the use of the Welland Canal, the St. Lawrence River canals, the Chambly Canal, or either of them, which is detrimental to the interests of the United States or any of its citizens, to direct the collection of tolls upon every foreign vessel and her cargo passing through either of said canals, or in his discretion to prohibit the use of said canals by any such foreign vessel.

It is asserted also that the President or his Secretary of the Treasury already has the power of retaliation under the act of 1866 (section 3005 of the Revised Statutes), which is as follows:

All merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, Portland, in Maine, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the adjacent British provinces, or arriving at the port of Point Isabel, in Texas, or any other port specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the Republic of Mexico, may be entered at the custom-house and conveyed in transit through the territory of the United States without the payment of duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

This section only refers to importations into Canada through the United States and does not refer to exportations. It contains no authority for a transshipment of goods through the United States to and from Canada and destined for other countries than the United States. It is as absolute in its terms as a statute can be, and is not conditioned upon any reciprocal right to be granted or act to be performed by Canada, and it is perfectly clear that there is no power granted in this section which authorizes the President to suspend its operations under any circumstances whatever.

Section 3006 of the Revised Statutes has also been referred to as conferring all the power necessary on the President. That section is as follows:

SEC. 3006. Imported merchandise in bond, or duty paid, and products or manufactures of the United States may, with the consent of the proper authorities of the British provinces or Republic of Mexico, be transported from one port in the United States to another port therein, over the territory of such provinces or Republic, by such routes and under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the merchandise so transported shall, upon arrival in the United States from such provinces or Republic, be treated in regard to the liability to or exemption from duty or tax, as if the transportation had taken place entirely within the limits of the United States.

This section relates alone to the coastwise trade of the United States, and to imported merchandise and products, or manufactures transported from one port in the United States to another port in the United States over foreign territory.

Back of both of these sections also is the act of 1864, section 3102 of the Revised Statutes, which allows the transshipment of goods through our territory in bond and free of duty upon the proper certificate of an officer of the United States duly authorized to act.

It is also contended that the power sought to be conferred upon the President is in opposition to Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, which is as follows:

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports of the United States which have been or may, from time to time, be specially designated by the President of the United States and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions through the territory of the United States for export from the said ports of the United States.

It is further agreed that, for the like period, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at any of the ports of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America and destined for the United States may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the said possessions, under such rules and regulations and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Governments of the said possessions may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without payment of duties, from the United States through the said possessions to other places in the United States or for export from ports in the said possessions.

This presents the leading question, to wit: Is Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 now in force? If Article XXIX is not in force, it is of great importance to determine whether it ceased to be in force because the treaty of 1871 was violated or whether, according to the provisions of the treaty, it fell with Article XXX and Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive.

Such high authority as Mr. Madison said, in his letter to Mr. Edmund Pendleton, January 2, 1791 (Wharton's Digest, International Law, section 138):

Treaties, as I understand the Constitution, are made supreme over the constitutions and laws of the particular States, and, like a subsequent law of the United States, over pre-existing laws of the United States; provided, however, that the treaty be within the prerogative of making treaties, which, no doubt, has certain limits.

That the contracting parties can annul the treaty can not, I presume, be questioned, the same authority precisely being exercised in annulling as in making a treaty.

That a breach on one side (even of a single article, each being considered as a condition of every other article) discharges the other is as little questionable, but with this reservation, that the other side is at liberty to take advantage or not of the breach as dissolving the treaty. * * *

Mr. Madison shows that a breach on one side of even a single article of a treaty discharges the other side, but with the reservation that the other side is at liberty to take advantage or not of the breach as dissolving the treaty.

There are important provisions in the treaty of 1871 in regard to navigation rights, boundary lines, etc., about which no complaint is made, and which our Government may wish to remain unabrogated.

The President in his message makes a just and proper distinction, and declares that Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 terminated July 1, 1885, when the fisheries articles terminated, but he also says:

Without basing our complaint upon a violation of treaty obligations, it is nevertheless true that such refusal of transit and the other injurious acts which have been recited constitute a provoking insistence upon rights neither mitigated by the amenities of national intercourse, nor modified by the recognition of our liberality and generous considerations.

I think it is clear that Article XXIX provides when it shall go into effect and when it shall cease to have effect. It fixes the term of its own existence, to wit, "the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII."

Article XXXIII does not mention Article XXIX, but contains a provision that Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry them into operation shall be passed by the legislative bodies of the different countries concerned therein, and that—

They shall remain in force for the period of ten years from the date in which they may come into operation, and further until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same.

The term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII having expired, including the two years required for notice of termination, I believe Article XXIX is not now in force, and that it died when the fisheries articles of the treaty of 1871 died. The Joint High Commissioners who negotiated the treaty so understood, and section third of the act of Congress approved March 1, 1873, substantially so declares.

The language of the President in his message on that subject is conclusive. He says:

I am of the opinion that the "term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII," referred to in Article XXIX as the limit of its duration, means the period during which Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX, commonly called the "fishery articles," should continue in force under the language of said Article XXXIII.

That the joint high commissioners who negotiated the treaty so understood and intended the phrase is certain, for in a statement containing an account of their negotiations, prepared under their supervision and approved by them, we find the following entry on the subject:

"The transit question was discussed, and it was agreed that any settlement that might be made should include a reciprocal arrangement in that respect for the period for which the fishery articles should be in force."

In addition to this very satisfactory evidence supporting this construction of the language of Article XXIX, it will be found that the law passed by Congress to carry the treaty into effect furnishes conclusive proof of the correctness of such construction.

This law was passed March 1, 1873, and is entitled "An act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed in the city of Washington the 8th day of May, 1871, relating to the fisheries." After providing in its first and second sections for putting in operation Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of the treaty, the third section is devoted to Article XXIX, as follows:

"SEC. 3. That from the date of the President's proclamation authorized by the first section of this act, and so long as the articles eighteenth to twenty-fifth, inclusive, and article thirtieth of said treaty, shall remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of article thirty-third of said treaty, all goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been, or may from time to time be, specially designated by the President of the United States, and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions, through the territory of the United States, for export from the said ports of the United States."

It is so well settled that the legislative power of our country is superior to the treaty-making power that it is hardly necessary to refer to the many decisions rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States on this subject, and I shall only refer to the language used by the court in one case. The court say (Head-money cases, United States Reports 112, page 599):

In short, we are of the opinion that so far as a treaty made by the United States with any foreign nation can be made the subject of judicial cognizance in the courts of this country it is subject to such acts as Congress may pass for its enforcement, modification, or repeal.

Mr. Speaker, once before in the history of our country a President of the United States called the attention of Congress to the manner in which Canada harassed American fishermen. Though he is dead now his action at that time is still admired, and will ever add additional luster to his great reputation as a patriot and soldier. I refer to President Grant. In his annual message in December, 1870, he alluded to the course pursued by the Canadian authorities toward the fishermen of the United States. In many respects the same state of affairs existed in 1870 that exist to-day, and President Grant said to Congress:

Anticipating that an attempt may possibly be made by the Canadian authorities in the coming season to repeat their unneighborly acts towards our fishermen, I recommend you to confer upon the Executive the power to suspend by proclamation the operation of the laws of authorizing the transit of goods, wares, and merchandise in bond across the territory of the United States to Canada; and further, if such extreme measure become necessary, to suspend the operation of any laws whereby the vessels of the Dominion of Canada are permitted to enter the waters of the United States.

The effect of this message was remarkable. Almost instantly agents were sent from London to Canada to warn the authorities that their unneighborly and improper acts toward American fishermen must cease, and before the fishing season came again the Joint High Commission which negotiated the treaty of Washington in 1871 was authorized.

Thus it appears that President Grant also believed that the proper way to settle these disputes and differences was through the treaty-making power.

If the treaty signed and concluded under the direction and authority of President Cleveland had been ratified by the Senate of the United States, as was the treaty signed and concluded during the administration of President Grant, there would have been an end to our fisheries trouble; but now that the Senate has declared that it will not allow President Cleveland to adjust by treaty the old disagreements and disputes which have been renewed on account of the expiration of the fishery provisions of the treaty of 1871, I do not see how any patriot who respects the dignity and honor of his country or the just rights of the people dare refuse to indorse the recommendations of the President that the existing powers of retaliation against Canada be enlarged.

The President also calls the attention of Congress to another subject involving wrongs and unfair treatment to our citizens. He says:

The navigation of the Great Lakes and the immense business and carrying trade growing out of the same have been treated with freedom and liberality by the United States Government and made free to all mankind, while Canadian railroads and navigation companies share in our country's transportation upon terms as favorable as are accorded to our own citizens.

And he recommends that such legislative action be taken as will give Canadian vessels navigating our canals and their cargoes precisely the advantage granted to our vessels and their cargoes upon Canadian canals, and that the same be measured by exactly the same rule of discrimination.

It is well known that the canals and other public works, built and maintained by our Government along the line of the Lakes, are made free to all. In contrast to this condition, every lock and canal which is a public work of the Dominion of Canada is subject to tolls and charges.

By Article XXVII of the treaty of Washington, provision was made to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence River, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, and also to secure to the subjects of Great Britain the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

Notwithstanding this solemn enactment and this intended equality, the Secretary of the Treasury has furnished Congress with evidence showing that an order has been issued by the authorities of the Dominion of Canada, and is now in force, by which vessels from ports of the United States, laden with wheat or other merchandise for export or otherwise, are required to pay less toll when they pursue their voyage by way of the St. Lawrence River and Montreal than when they pursue their voyage by way of Lake Ontario or American ports, the Canadian regulations clearly operating as a discrimination against American ports, American railroads and canals, and American vessels.

To meet this unjust discrimination, the bill under consideration provides that whenever the President shall be satisfied that there is any discrimination whatever in the use of the Welland Canal, the St. Lawrence River canals, the Chambly Canal, or either of them, which may be detrimental to the interests of the United States, or any of its citizens, he is authorized in his discretion to issue a proclamation directing that a toll of 20 cents a ton upon every foreign vessel and her cargo passing through either the Sault Ste. Marie Canal or the St. Clair Flats Canal be collected, and providing further that the President may, in his discretion, when he is satisfied there is any such discrimination, prohibit the use of said canals to any such foreign vessel.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I wish to say with emphasis that we should not fail to be mindful of the obligation which our Government owes to more than one hundred thousand men, who manage six thousand vessels engaged in our sea and lake fisheries. Many of these men pursue their hazardous business amid dangers such as are not encountered by any other class of citizens, and they maintain an industry the annual products of which are valued at $45,000,000.

The time has come when we ought to be in earnest, and our legislation should be such as to prove to Canada, to Great Britain, and to the world that we are in earnest.

The power granted to the President in the pending bill is no stronger than it ought to be. It is time Canadian wrongs should be resented by the United States and repressed by Great Britain. The bill should be passed promptly.

Almost every case in which American vessels have been seized by the Canadian authorities was in violation of the spirit of the treaty of 1818. Almost every seizure was in violation of that comity, hospitality, and good feeling that the civilization of this age requires between neighboring nations.

Adjoining nations are compelled to provide for their mutual interests by legislation. If the Dominion of Canada, supported by the Government of Great Britain, legislates in hostility to the interests of our citizens, it is not only our duty but now it is our only alternative to legislate in hostility to their interests and retaliate for their bad conduct.

The bill under consideration is not a war measure, but it is a peace measure. It is a public, plain announcement to our people and to the people of Great Britain that the Government of the United States proposes to maintain its dignity and protect the rights of its citizens.

The President will exercise the power confided to him intelligently, conservatively, and courageously. There can be no doubt about his proper appreciation of the dignity and honor of the great Republic over which he presides, and any power placed in his hands will be used for the protection of American dignity and of American rights.

It is by no means certain that he will be required to issue the proclamations authorized by the bill. I hope and believe that when the bill under consideration is enacted into a law, the usual wisdom and good judgment of the Canadian authorities and of the English authorities will again be manifested and all difficulties arranged without resort to anything that will break up the cordial relations which have existed for so many years between the United States and Great Britain.

Let the result be as it will, I believe the President will be supported by the people of the United States, regardless of party, in his efforts to exercise such authority as may be granted to him by Congress. There will be no division on sectional lines, but men of the South and men of the North will stand shoulder to shoulder, in solid phalanx, to defend American rights and American honor. [Loud continued applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McCREARY. I was about to suggest that if I had any further time I would reserve it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has exceeded his time by three minutes; and if there be no objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois for the same length of time in addition to his hour.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, this new retaliation bill and the message with which it was sent here deserve comment, or I would not detain the House from voting by any remarks of mine. The circumstances attending it and the peculiar character of the message that the bill accompanied were a surprise to the House. The message was received with partisan applause on the Democratic side of the House, the first word uttered about it being from the irrepressible and enthusiastic gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], who cried out it was a "good campaign document." [Laughter.] The description sticks to it in the public mind.

Presidents' messages sent to Congress are usually state papers, and I am not willing to accept that declaration even of his political friend, and the imputation that all this is a mere electioneering device. The President in this message takes a new position that to every one of us was gratifying in that it admits we were right—all of us who have urged retaliation before—and in that it admits his great mistake in abandoning the rights of our fishermen in his late unlamented treaty.

We have been humbled of late. Our Chief Magistrate sent in a treaty which he called a "just, honorable, and satisfactory settlement," and in it the rights of American fishermen contended for and firmly claimed for many years were given up and to be purchased as privileges. Now he sends a message, and with it comes a bill to empower him to retaliate for the violation of rights not taken care of in that which he said was just settlement, but in that just settlement were excluded. He has found out that he was wrong and we were right.

Who can forget the resounding terms with which this Administration two years ago vindicated in words the rights, the incontestable rights, of American fishermen which we have claimed for some fifty years? And these rights, commercial rights, extended by us to British subjects in all our ports, and claimed by us in theirs, were utterly abandoned in that treaty which the gentleman from Kentucky has just been eulogizing, as did the President, who called it just, honorable, and satisfactory.

These commercial rights, so stoutly, and I believe so truthfully and logically, contended for in 1886 by the Secretary of State, by Minister Phelps, the voice of our people speaking officially, are not recognized, set out, and protected in the Chamberlain treaty at all. They are relegated to the fifteenth article, near the end, and among them the right to transship fish. It is there agreed that these rights may be purchased by us hereafter as privileges by giving up to Canadians the whole amount of what they pay now as duties upon their fish sent into the United States. When the President has discovered, as it is evident he has, how greatly and how grievously he was mistaken as to the rights of American fishermen, because here he asks us for authority to retaliate for the violation of one of those very rights so mistakenly abandoned last February, I do not feel like interposing opposition.

We might say in response to his request for power to retaliate that he has already abundant powers, and we would like them tried.

The Congress has conferred upon him once and again in great and liberal measure authority to vindicate our wronged fishermen on the northeast coast. He can exclude Canadian ships, fish, products, or any goods coming from Canada. He asks an enlargement on one side of one of the powers contained in that act of 1887; he wishes power to stop goods going through to Canada. Congress there conferred upon him powers—with a wide discretion as to how he might apply them, revoke in part or in whole or renew—to retaliate for the offenses committed by the Canadian fishermen upon our fishermen, graduating all, in kind, in degree, rising higher and higher. He may retaliate by first excluding their vessels, not merely fishing ships, but all vessels from Canada—their steam-ship lines, their trading vessels, their fishing vessels—all. Second, he may deny entrance to Canadian fish. Third, he may exclude or deny entrance to any other product of the Dominion of Canada.

Then come the sweeping words "or other goods coming from the Dominion of Canada." We thought when we discussed and passed the act of 1887 that we could not touch the bonded transit system, nor interrupt it in anyway in our proposed retaliation; but that the treaty of 1871, in its twenty-ninth article, protected the right of both Americans and Canadians to send goods in bond across the other's territory without paying duty. That was all that stood in the way of his excluding all goods coming from Canada; he could not stop those bonded in transit. But the President now says, in his new fishery message, that twenty-ninth article is abrogated, and the gentleman who has just taken his seat says it is "dead." There is nothing, then, to prevent him from stopping goods coming from Canada, even though by the bonded system, if they only come from Canada to the United States to go through our country, and the extension of power asked is to substantially authorize the arrest of the whole bonded-transit system both ways. This would of course authorize the President to stop the entry of goods coming by way of our ports and going to Canada as provided for by the act of 1866, which the gentleman has read in extenso.

For vindicating the rights of our fishermen many members perhaps think this is not a necessary power at all; and many think he has abundant power already, and that this is like his request for power to buy bonds when he had abundant power. But there is a difference between that case and this. That was a mere pretense of want of power for a purpose, and we could readily refuse such a request when the pretense was brought out, the politics in it exposed. This is a question not of business policy, but of the rights of American citizens. The President asks for an additional power for their protection by retaliation. We have indicated to him long ago that he ought to retaliate. He has done nothing. If we refuse this request may it not be held to mean that we exonerate him for his failures and intimate that he need do nothing—at least, excuse inaction? With him lies the vast responsibility of his acts. He is President. I am unwilling to refuse a power asked to protect such rights. I know there are reasons for distrust, for refusing additional authority, and still further extension of his powers of retaliation. But I do not accept as a basis of my own action the theory of the gentleman who called this a "campaign document." That is sounding a depth we have never yet reached in American politics. We must still consider it as a President's message.

The gentleman from Kentucky, with a felicity characteristic of his expressions, rich in what they imply or suggest, in eulogizing it classed this fishery message with the message of last December, sometimes known as the "free-trade message." It was an apt combination; the fishery troubles and free-trade—how can they be used to aid it?—and the treatment of the fishery question and the tendency towards free-trade that distinguish the Administration have gone hand in hand since the day of the inauguration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

How did the Administration begin this curious business—this long play of one interest to forward a pet theory? In 1883 this House and the Senate, by a joint resolution, had provided for the termination in July, 1885, of the fishery articles of the treaty of 1871, which the gentleman has cited, and that termination was to take place in a few months, when the present Administration came into office.

Everybody interested, the fishermen and all others, had been notified for two years. All were prepared for it, and all the fishermen of the United States were impatiently waiting for the last day of the arrangement which had proven to be so greatly to their disadvantage. They did not ask and did not want any interference in their behalf to prolong it. It was only eight days after the beginning of this reform Administration when a discussion was commenced with the British minister for the renewal of the arrangement, the news of which filled the Canadians with joy and the American fishermen with dismay. It was to provide that our fishermen should still enjoy the inshore fisheries of Canada, which they did not want; and although the Administration or the Executive could not suspend the tariff laws and give the Canadians free trade in fish at once, he could take the first step towards that end; and accordingly a promise was made to the British minister that the President would recommend to Congress the appointment of a commission to take up the subject of the fisheries, and the commission, he was assured, would go on and consider the enlargement of trade—in other words, free trade in fish.

The President kept his word. He sent in a message that recommended a commission. I remember it well. He urged upon this House to proceed in that line and authorize a commission. Now, the House, though Democratic and friendly to the President as far as it could go, would do nothing of the kind. The members knew too well the sentiment of the people on this subject. It was sent to the Senate also, and the Senate sent him back word that it disapproved of any such course. That was a disappointment—a check. His policy—that same policy that is indicated by his last free-trade message, and which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] classed together with this fishery message—was pursued still. The Canadians, greatly encouraged by what had been done by our Government, now began a campaign of outrages upon our fishermen by every form of vexation intended to secure this free trade in fish, which they believed they would ultimately obtain indirectly if not directly.

Is there any one here who can forget the indignation of every American citizen during 1886 at the recital of wrongs brought daily from the Northeast, of ships boarded, arrested, and tied up in the Canadian ports, the inhumanities to which our fishermen were subjected, the insults to the American flag? The story is a burning one of wrongs unredressed and insults unavenged to this hour. The House, responsive to indignant public feeling, took the matter up and passed the retaliation bill of 1887. Negotiations, however, had been going on all the time, and strangely enough after Congress had thus spoken went on still. It seemed to be determined in advance that the right way was not to stop the wrongdoer, but to commence discussion with him and continue it and persist in it.

The retaliation bill was passed, conferring upon the Executive the authority which I have already briefly stated. It stands upon the statute-book still, and eighteen months have passed by. None of the powers conferred in that bill have been exercised, and no intimation was ever given that any was meditated until a few days ago we received a request for still more power.

This system of outrages which I have spoken of was checked in part, I think, by the influence of the passage of that retaliation bill, which this House passed by a vote of 236 against 1, a pretty strong indication by the representatives of the people of the sentiment of the nation and of the method the American people desired the Executive to take to enforce the rights and redress the wrongs of our fellow-citizens. Negotiations went on still, not visible to the great world, and cropped out at last in the Bayard-Chamberlain negotiation—which all of you remember—last winter.

We knew nothing in this Hall, nothing was known anywhere to the outside world, of the proceedings in that negotiation, and we waited all with anxiety, and some with hope, for the treaty that was to be the result. It came at last in February, and the country cried out at the lame conclusion. The gentleman from Kentucky has compared that treaty with the treaty of 1871, and the treatment it received in the Senate with the treatment which the treaty of 1871 received in General Grant's time.

The different treatment which the two received is a very good indication of their respective merits. One was an abandonment of the rights of American citizens, and was rejected by the Senate; the other, covering a great body of subjects, dealt with them in a spirit which the nation and, I believe, mankind has approved; and in a part of that treaty relating to the Alabama claims there was a great advance in the methods of adjusting international disputes. It was a notable event in the history of the progress of international law. That treaty was received with general satisfaction, and was confirmed by the Senate.

I must say that the part which dealt with this fatal subject of the fisheries proved hardly better than some other arrangements had been before and have been since, and we were glad to terminate it as soon as we could in 1885. It was an unfortunate thing, and there is no need of reviving the history and the bitterness connected with the story of the Halifax Commission and that unjust award by an unfair umpire, based on pretended evidence long since exposed and denounced.

The treaty that was brought in last February, called generally the Bayard-Chamberlain treaty, was the one which, before we saw it, we had anxiously hoped would fulfill expectations excited by the spirited dispatches of Mr. Bayard, and would give protection and security thereafter to the oft-asserted rights of American citizens. Anticipating it, many of us looked back over the protesting dispatches written during the time Canadian fishermen were committing daily outrages upon our fishermen, recalled what Minister Phelps, as well as Secretary Bayard, had said with such forcible logic of our rights to commercial privileges in British ports similar to those we granted to British vessels and fishermen in our ports; of the rights determined by the reciprocal legislation of 1830.

What was the result? When that treaty came we discovered that it abandoned a vast region of fishing waters in which American fishermen had been before as free to fish as on the high seas, and it allotted those waters by delimitation to be held exclusively for the Canadians. There were some provisions to grant to Americans what would not be denied by any nation on earth—refuge in disaster, relief from some of the most exasperating vexations of litigation, facilities for sickness and death. But the treaty relegated to the fifteenth article those great and cardinal questions of American rights which this Administration had defended with vigor—I wish I could add, had persisted in defending to the last.

The assertion of those rights has been the task of American statesmen for many years, and it is hard to say which of our public men has stated most vigorously and forcibly the doctrine of the rights of American fishermen in the ports of the Canadian coast. That treaty passed those rights to a contingent, separate article, which provided that we might hereafter, by paying for them in the remission of the duty on fish, obtain those commercial privileges—purchase of supplies and transshipment of catch. It gave up the whole question. Fortunately the Senate received that treaty in a spirit of careful scrutiny. They found it vastly different from the treaty of 1871, and they properly rejected it. It was subjected to long examination and debate, and in that crucible it was found utterly wanting. The opinion of the country had rejected it long before the vote of the Senate.

As the gentleman from Kentucky said, it is dead, and it were well if that were the end of it; but it has left behind a heavy load. The admissions in that treaty live to plague us. They are the admissions of the organ of the American people, the Executive of the nation. They are the most solemn and formal declaration of the whole scope and boundary of our rights, as we by our President recognize them in a document that he calls "just, honorable, and satisfactory." While it is not a treaty in force and has no obligation now, it may be cited, as it certainly will be, in any negotiations that we may enter upon hereafter.

It was said in the discussion of that treaty elsewhere, and in the press, that the enforcement of its terms would lead to the same old vexation, troubles, and confusion in the future, when harshly enforced, especially the third and fourth articles, changing the dead line, as it certainly would be if the hope of free fish through that means was again held out to Canada; that the line of delimitation was one hard to enforce and the line 3 miles from low-water mark difficult to observe in murky wild weather, and so our fishermen would be liable to seizure if fishing or preparing to fish; that there were in the treaty provisions which the hostile spirit of Canadian local authorities could make the ground of multiplying controversies, so that if ratified it would not have been a cure even for those minor difficulties, while it gave away the great points in the controversy.

There was a part of that treaty which was not written; a postscript which was not printed with it. A treaty is a bargain. There was more bargained in this case than was written down and signed. The protocols were sent to the Senate upon its request, and are public documents which we have seen, containing the record of the formal meeting and adjournment each day—a barren record of forms and dates. The arguments, the concessions, the negotiations, the daily struggle of mind with mind in adjusting these questions of rights, of values, of places, in all their sinuosities, are not shown there, nor the agreements nor the promises. But as in Great Britain the Parliamentary government, by its system of open explanations, often discloses to Europe many secrets which otherwise would not be known from anything on the continent, so the repetition of that same system of government on the north brings us some information from the Canadian Parliament, to which Sir Charles Tupper made his report when he returned from Washington; and we find it printed in Hansard, the official publication of the Government of Canada. In that report this accomplished and trained statesman, who has dealt with this grave question so many times, whose skill, whose experience, whose knowledge, we have had occasion to know in negotiations for many years, stated, and with reserve (for he said he must be cautious in his statements, as all that he was saying there might be quoted against their interests pending in Washington)—stated, as touching the question of free trade, that there were some promises, which I will not try to repeat without reading his exact words from the official record. I read:

Mr. Bayard told us, the American plenipotentiaries told us, that there was but one way of obtaining what we wished. "You want greater freedom of commercial intercourse; you want relaxation in our tariff arrangements," etc.

"You will find "—

Continues Mr. Bayard—I give his closing language—

"You will find that the policy of this Government, the policy of the President, and of the House of Representatives, the policy of the great Democratic party of the United States, will at once take an onward march in the direction you propose"—

[Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

"and accomplish steadily that which you would desire. It is the only way it can ever be attained."

Sir Charles then adds:

Those were not empty words; those were the sober utterances of distinguished statesmen, who pointed to the avowed policy of the Government of the United States as the best evidence of the sincerity of what they said.

Then he calls attention to the position on this floor of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. I am sorry that gentleman is not present, as I refer to him personally. But, says Sir Charles Tupper, as chairman of the great Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. MILLS occupies a position in the American Congress corresponding to finance minister in a parliamentary government—is selected by the Speaker—designated in obedience to the sentiment of the Democratic party.

Sir Charles Tupper then adds:

What have we seen? The ink is barely dry upon this treaty before he, as the representative of the Government and chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, brings forward a measure—to do what? Why, to make free articles that Canada sends into the United States, and upon which last year $1,800,000 of duty was paid.

Let me add that he not only introduced the Mills bill, but pressed it through the House. He kept Mr. Bayard's word to the letter. That part was ratified. The Democratic party stood by its bargain with the British plenipotentiary. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The eminent gentleman from Texas to whom I refer, and who, I regret, is absent, is "starring in the provinces," carrying on the great campaign work of which my mistaken friend from Missouri [Mr. O'NEIL] calls this President's message a part. And I observed the report of a remark by the gentleman from Texas, referring to this very message, that "while the Republicans may have taken the British lion by the tail, we take him by the snout." That was just after he had carried out this bargain with the British envoy and crammed the British lion's mouth with $1,800,000 a year—a sheer gift! "We take him by the snout!" [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. MCCREARY] argued at much length the question of the abrogation at present of the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871, providing for reciprocal transit in bond across the United States and across Canada. I do not think it necessary to assent or answer. The President in his message tells us that in 1886 notice was given to our representatives that this right of transshipment in bond would be denied to us. That denial to us would relieve us of obligation to Canada. I have tried to get a copy of that notice. I have asked our amiable acting chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. MCCREARY], as the organ of the committee, if he would procure it from the State Department, where——

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman will permit me. The notice referred to was in the case which undoubtedly is familiar to my colleague on the committee, the case of the Novelty, which has been——

Mr. HITT. I am familiar with the case of the Novelty; but the remark of the President in his message is that "in 1886 notice was received by the representatives of our Government," and he uses the word in a way which would lead us to accept it as meaning formal and solemn notice from one government to another, given in 1886 to our representatives. Why, sir, the story of the Novelty is a statement made by the Secretary of State, in a dispatch to Minister West, that the consul at Halifax told him that the collector of customs told him that they would not allow transshipment in bond. That is the "notice."

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman recognizes that is sufficient notice.

Mr. HITT. I have not complained of that.

Mr. BELMONT. The American consul at Halifax received notice certain privileges had been withdrawn.

Mr. HITT. I am aware of what the gentleman is stating.

Mr. BELMONT. Privileges which had been up to that time granted under Canadian laws.

Mr. HITT. That does not appear in the dispatches.

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman will acknowledge that would be sufficient notice?

Mr. HITT. I have read the dispatch to which the gentleman refers, wherein it appears that Mr. West is informed that Mr. Bayard is informed that Mr. Phelan is informed by a collector of customs at that office that they would not allow any further shipments in bond.

Mr. BELMONT. I ask the gentleman if he does or does not consider the notice sufficient?

Mr. HITT. I am not questioning the truth of this or the validity of the notice.

Mr. BELMONT. That is all I wish to know, and I am perfectly satisfied with the answer of my colleague.

Mr. HITT. No, sir; I have not questioned that. I have been trying to find out if there was anything more. I have been waiting to know whether there was or not any formal document. I know the President would not have made such a statement unless it was true. His statement in his message that there was a notice is sufficient.

That notice that the reciprocal obligation on the side of the British to permit shipment in bond would no longer be observed released us at once from observing it. I think that is the end of that question, without trying to prove that Article XXIX died in some secret way unknown to either nation three years ago, because it said "for the term mentioned in Article XXXIII," and Article XXXIII said that Articles XVIII to XXV and XXX should stand ten years and further till one of the parties gave two years' notice, and notice was given and ended XVIII to XXV and XXX, and XXIX must have died with them.

I have seen no need of going into the humiliation of an argument concerning the force of Article XXIX, based on references and cross-references, and forced meanings of words, as if I were trying to get a thief out of trouble on a flaw in an indictment, picking out a reference from one article of the treaty and then picking out something else from another article of the treaty, and so on, trying to infer from them when pieced together that it could be considered as then terminated, when no one knew it.

It may be a plausible and ingenious legal argument as the President has made it in his message. I will not examine it; I will not be drawn into it. Sir, in dealings between two great nations, the leading peoples of the world, can we after three years have passed and we as well as the other side have acted daily and are now acting on the twenty-ninth article, can we in good faith undo it in a moment without a word and say it has been void for years? The notice received in 1886 that they would not observe it on the other side released us at once from the obligation to observe it, though that did not terminate the article.

As the President considered that a full notice in 1886, why did he not act then and inform the British Government that their refusal of transshipment would be met by refusal on our part? I regret that he has waited so long without acting either on the retaliation measure we placed in his hands, or on the notice from the other side that gave him the opportunity for acting.

There is something—to recur again to that twenty-ninth article—mysterious about its alleged demise. I was a member of the committee that reported the joint resolution in 1883 to terminate the fishery articles. I believe I am almost the sole survivor on the committee besides my friend, General KETCHAM.

At the time that resolution to abrogate the fishery articles was before the committee the bonded transit system, under the twenty-ninth article, was considered, and it was intended to avoid touching that system. Members from the Northwest were concerned about it.

When that resolution passed upon this floor Mr. Washburne, of Minnesota, asked whether there was anything which touched shipment in bond. Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts, a veteran and eminent member of the committee, told the House that its terms were framed expressly to avoid that.

In the Senate Mr. Windom, from Minnesota, had raised the question and the words had been amended with that very purpose. If the joint resolution struck at Article XXIX the House did not know it. The Senate did not know it. President Arthur did not know it. He did not mention it in his proclamation; nor was it in the earlier communication or notice by Mr. Lowell to the British Government. Lord Granville did not know it, did not so understand it, but just the contrary. When he received notice of the passage of the resolution he called Mr. Lowell's attention to the possible termination of the thirty-second article of the treaty, which was concerning Newfoundland, and not having been carried out by Newfoundland in legislation seemed to be by its terms of no effect; and Lord Granville asked, to be perfectly clear, if that was also to be held to be terminated. Mr. Lowell said, "You are right; but I will consult Mr. Frelinghuysen." A correspondence ensued; Mr. Frelinghuysen confirmed and approved what Mr. Lowell had said; not a word in the correspondence by Mr. Frelinghuysen or the others to intimate that Article XXIX was included or touched at all.

In an interesting interview, communicated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT], or what purported to be an interview, published in the New York World of last Friday, I see a statement to the effect that he last year waited upon Mr. Cleveland at the time the Belmont bill was under consideration in the House, and discussed it with the President, who approved it, and the gentleman can correct me if the extract does not faithfully represent what he said; that some gentlemen from the Northwest (I assume that they were some Democratic members), feeling anxious and uneasy as to the results of the Belmont bill upon the people of that section by its possible effect on traffic, spoke to him in reference to the matter, and he took them to the White House and discussed the bill with the President, who approved the Belmont bill. Now, the Belmont bill contains an express recognition of Article XXIX. [Laughter.] So the President thought it was in force. It provides that, "upon proof that the privileges secured by Article XXIX of the treaty concluded between the United States and Great Britain on May 8, 1871, are denied as to goods, etc., the President may also by proclamation forbid the exercise of the like privileges as to goods," etc.——

Mr. BELMONT. Will the gentleman permit me a moment to interrupt him just there, as he has referred to me?

Mr. HITT. If the gentleman wishes me to yield for a question I will do so, but I would rather, as he is to follow me, that he will explain in his own time.

Mr. BELMONT. I think I can give a satisfactory explanation.

Mr. HITT. I trust it will be satisfactory.

Any one who has the RECORD in his possession can refer to the bill of which I have spoken. President Cleveland thought last year that the twenty-ninth article was valid, and that we should observe it and make the other side observe it. We thought so when we framed the retaliation act.

The debate then turned on that very point; and if any one will take the pains to do so, although I do not know that any one has sufficient curiosity to read old Congressional debates of eighteen months ago, he will find that great care was taken to avoid any infringement of that article. Articles of agreement, when there is a question as to their meaning, are usually construed as between contending parties by the long continued conduct of the parties to the contract, and these two nations have plainly by their acts construed this article as a pledge of their mutual faith, binding upon each, and no one thought of questioning it until last Thursday week, when it was revealed for the first time from the White House. Then a revelation came that this article had died—died in the night over three years ago, the whole world unconscious of the fact. I notice in the morning papers that the Canadian ministers in recent speeches have referred to the twenty-ninth article of this treaty as in force. It is evident that they had not learned all that is known in Washington.

Why, there is another article with the same phraseology as the twenty-ninth, "for the term mentioned in Article XXXIII," which the President's argument or discovery would abrogate; I mean Article XXVIII of the same treaty. It begins in the same words, provides for the same term mentioned in Article XXXIII, which provides a method for the termination of articles, ten years and further till two years' notice is given, and yet I have not heard gentlemen claim that the rule which they would apply to Article XXIX should determine the existence of Article XXVIII as well.

Now, the twenty-eighth article is that which makes Lake Michigan free to Canadian vessels, and this afternoon at the ports of Milwaukee and Chicago, all along their docks are Canadian ships whose right to be there depends on that article, which died three years ago and they do not know it. [Laughter.] They do not know that there is no such article and they have no right to be there, and are liable to be turned out of the whole lake by telegraph at any hour.

No, Mr. Speaker, there is no need of resorting to any such quibble to justify our action in voting for a bill granting plenary authority in this matter. The British authorities have disregarded their obligations to permit the transit in bond, and therefore the obligation is not binding on us. If we choose to assert our release, we can do so at any time. A decent regard for the usages of mankind ordinarily demands a communication when such disputes occur. The aggrieved nation usually informs the other that they have disregarded the agreement and refused their part of the reciprocal duties and obligations, and so can not expect a one-sided performance of the agreement. We can therefore cease on our part. That is all that is necessary.

The authority the President asks, according to his own theory and message, he possesses—that is, touching goods coming from Canada, for we provided in that very act a power which I mentioned some time ago, whereby, under certain conditions, he might exclude not only vessels from our ports and everywhere from entrance into the country, but any other product of Canada and any goods coming from Canada; English or Chinese, or any other goods in Canada or coming from Canada could be excluded by him from that side. The bonded transit system having been disregarded by the British is no longer binding upon us, and hence he can exclude them now, coming from either way. This authority now asked, to exclude goods coming from either way, would enable him to stop transit of goods for Canada arriving at New York and other ports, provided for in the act of 1866. In so far this bill would confer an enlargement of the authority granted in the retaliation act of 1887. That is about all there is of it; for that act substantially covers goods coming from Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the President lays stress upon retaliation for fishermen's wrongs by striking at traffic in bond. He says in his message that retaliation should be by "visiting upon the offending party the same measure or kind of treatment of which we complain and as far as possible within the same lines," and, he says, "with the least possible damage to ourselves." As a practical fact, the interruption of the traffic in bond would probably affect our people more seriously and more injuriously than anything that has transpired in the fishing difficulty since the beginning; and as to punishing an enemy, while it might trouble many persons in Canada, it would play directly into the hands and promote the purposes of the body of men who now rule Canada.

Canada is ruled by a body of able men under a system which has enabled the Tory party with concentrated English influence to keep Sir John Macdonald in power now these many years. Every means within the reach of that governing Tory influence has long been exerted to develop every element which would tend to keep that people separate from the United States; to bind them together, to force them in spite of nature to deal only along that northern line, to unite and come together as nearly like a nation as possible. It was a tremendous problem.

Canada upon the map appears a great block of country, half a continent; in fact it is a long feeble string of thinly united groups of population. The maritime provinces are separated by a vast region of almost desert country from the large body of people that occupy the central region of Quebec and Ontario; then there is a long rocky stretch of the upper Lake Superior country separating that from the Manitoba region, and then again you must traverse a vast vacant space to reach the coast province around Vancouver. All along, pressing close upon them on the south, is the great Republic, sixty millions strong.

To prevent the subtle attraction and almost irresistible tendency together of neighboring populations, which drew each of these groups of Canadian people by interest to the great people on the south, has long been the effort of Canadian statesmen. They have bound these several populations together by a costly and unprofitable system of government railroads or roads subsidized by government. The one that connects the maritime provinces with Quebec was constructed by a tremendous outlay from the treasury. It cost more than forty millions. It is worth nothing, less than nothing. It is a constant drain and burden upon the treasury.

I saw a gentleman who had been over it recently and he said the grass would yet grow between the tracks of that great costly thoroughfare, so slight is the business now done. Stop transit in bond now coming across the United States, turn it all over that intercolonial road to the sea, and it will become a great trunk line, its trains loaded with the commerce of central Canada. Now, I have no sympathy with the separative policy of Sir John Macdonald and his Government, nor with that Tory party which governs the Canadian people. I would gladly see improved relations between the two countries, but I do not want all the concession on one side; for instance, by giving up $1,800,000 annually of duties upon their goods, with no reciprocal concession whatever; nor do I see the wisdom of promoting the general policy of the Tory government.

The people of Canada are not our enemies. Why, one million of our constituents were born in Canada. I believe it is estimated that one-fourth of the native-born Canadians are to-day in the United States. They are good citizens, among the most industrious, intelligent, loyal and patriotic. Do you believe their relatives across the way think only of this country in hatred? The fishermen of Canada, owing to the jealousy of conflicting interests, have inflicted wrongs on our fishermen.

Let me recall the words of the President that retaliation should be "visited upon the offending party." Stop the transit-in-bond system, turn Canadian traffic to their coast, and you will make the cities of Halifax and St. John prosperous centers of new life and wealth—towns the names of which recall to every American the indignation he felt through 1886 at the news from that quarter of humiliation and outrage to our citizens.

The President thinks we should punish the offending party "in the same line with the injured." Would not the offending party be rewarded? He can hurt our own Northwest, if he shall be so injudicious as to select this among all the methods of retaliation we placed in his hands in that wide discretion we gave him to choose any part, to apply to any part, to enforce, revoke, or renew.

He would, in arresting this large intercourse, with a certainty that it will be met by like measures on the other side, take away the competition of the Canadian lines, and make the control of the trunk-line pool complete over this business. They could dictate terms as they pleased to the Northwest. I will not readily believe that the President of the United States will ever subject a large number of our people unnecessarily to such retaliation—retaliation upon ourselves.

Wrongs are going on now in the way of interrupting fishermen and fishing vessels, retaliation for which has been provided in the law. Why is it not applied? No, he thinks the way to redress fishermen's wrongs is to admit foreign fish free, and bankrupt them, while benefiting those who wronged them.

The gentleman from Kentucky read some facts for which I thank him. I took note of them, and will recall them to attention. The Herman Sampson within two weeks was seized and fined by the Canadian authorities in defiance of those very rights which Mr. Bayard and Mr. Phelps so often stated with just and forcible logic. That vessel had been to St. John's to buy some herring.

The Novelty, of which the gentleman also spoke, was refused coal a week before. Twenty-five vessels this season are said to have been compelled to pay from $150 to $200 for the privilege of buying supplies; the very privilege which we claimed for our fishermen in this discussion which has run through a lifetime. That right is one that we extend every day to any Canadian vessel, fishing or trading, and we have contended always that our vessels, with proper permits to trade, were entitled to the same rights in Canadian ports.

The President is clothed with power to retaliate. Why does he not enforce the retaliation now? Why is he waiting? The message indicates a sudden outburst of zeal on behalf of the fishermen. His indignation is all at the wrong done to our fishermen in denying them transshipment of fish in bond. How great and urgent is it? The consul-general at Halifax, who was named by the gentleman from New York a few moments ago, is Mr. Michael Phelan, an appointee of the present Administration, and, I am told, a man of singular intelligence. Let me read a few words from what that consul-general stated so recently as the 24th of August:

> Mackerel is the only fish there is that our fishermen want to transship home in bond, and as there are no mackerel being caught this year, that is not a live question just now.

[Laughter.]

That is the last word I have been able to obtain from any source likely to be well informed on this subject. Is the President thinking of fishermen; or is he fishing for votes? [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Kentucky referred to the reception given in England to General Grant's message when he threatened retaliation. We have had some opportunity to see the reception given in England to the President's message sent here the other day. The chief organ of opinion in the British Empire is the London Times, and it greets with admiring congratulation the President's message, apparently hostile, remembering that he is the author of the two messages which the gentleman from Kentucky aptly compared, the free-trade message as well as the fisheries message. The London Times, bearing in mind the whole situation, says:

> President Cleveland has dished the Republicans by a masterly move, and may fairly be congratulated upon his adroitness.

[Laughter and applause.]

The writer knew that the Administration which came out with this stage-thunder now was the same one that had brought in and driven through the Mills bill, giving the Canadians $1,800,000 a year of remission of duties without any compensation whatever.

Sir, I have favored remission of duties where it could be done with reciprocal advantage. Numerous instances have arisen in the last dozen years, while I have had my attention directed to our relations with different foreign nations, where I thought such exchanges of reciprocal facilities could have been made with great profit to our country. I have never yet, however, seen the instance where there was a country which I loved so much better than my own that I would take from our revenues $1,800,000 every year and give it to them for nothing. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I am still an American.

I have spoken long, perhaps, too long for your patience, of our relations with Canada, and I must add that the remission of the duties levied upon Canadian products would, I believe, be wise policy if we in return could secure the Canadian market. But we have always been most unfortunate in dealing with those statesmen, and have always been outwitted. It has been almost all concession on our part—little or nothing secured in return. It was so in that one-sided and unfortunate treaty of 1854, called the reciprocity treaty. It was so in the unfortunate arrangement, called a treaty, recently negotiated by Sir Charles Tupper and Mr. Chamberlain, where we yielded all along the line and made a provision at the end to give up to them the duties on fish in return for what we had always claimed were our incontestable rights. It was so again when we yielded to them in the Mills bill, passed here in the House, without any compensation whatever.

I would enlarge widely, very widely, our relations with Canada if I could do it so that the arrangement would be profitable to our own citizens. I am an advocate of friendly relations with foreign countries. It is the policy of wisdom. It is inspired by the highest and broadest sentiments that should animate every public man and every nation. Whenever it can be done with an enlightened self-interest in view, which in nations as in individuals must be the guide, it is our duty to cultivate in every way friendly relations and increased intercourse with foreign countries; and I believe this Canadian question and all questions cognate to it will yet be solved on broader lines and on higher principles.

I have introduced a measure, now on the Calendar, looking to commercial union with Canada, excluding all idea of political union. I hope it may yet receive thoughtful and favorable consideration. I fear, however, that it will not be done immediately, but it will be when calm shall return to heated spirits, when Presidents' messages shall no more be campaign documents, when legislation will not be debased for use as electioneering devices.

Nor do I entertain confident hope of wise action on legislation already had. I cannot help sharing some of the distrust that so many have emphatically expressed of the present Administration and the sincerity of its awakening to duty and adopting the ideas that we have pressed so long upon it. We cannot tell whether aught will result, but it will not be long till, I trust, in other and I believe better hands an administration will take up the whole subject and bring it to a just, honorable, and satisfactory conclusion—a solution which will be permanent, which will bring our interests together in mutual harmony for mutual profit, conserving the peace and the independence and the glory of both peoples. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

JOINT RESOLUTION OF MARCH 3, 1883, TO TERMINATE FISHERY ARTICLES.

Joint resolution providing for the termination of Articles numbered XVIII to XXV inclusive, and Article numbered XXX of the treaty between the United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, concluded at Washington May 8, 1871.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in the judgment of Congress the provisions of Articles numbered XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and of Article XXX of the treaty between the United States and Her Britannic Majesty, for an amicable settlement of all causes of difference between the two countries, concluded at Washington on the 8th day of May, A. D. 1871, ought to be terminated at the earliest possible time and be no longer in force; and to this end the President be, and he hereby is, directed to give notice to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty that the provisions of each and every of the articles aforesaid will terminate and be of no force on the expiration of two years next after the time of giving such notice.

SEC. 2. That the President be, and he hereby is, directed to give and communicate to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty such notice of such termination on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1883, or as soon thereafter as may be.

SEC. 3. That on and after the expiration of the two years' time required by said treaty, each and every of said articles shall be deemed and held to have expired and be of no force and effect, and that every department of the Government of the United States shall execute the laws of the United States (in the premises) in the same manner and to the same effect as if said articles had never been in force; and the act of Congress approved March 1, A. D. 1873, entitled "An act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed in the city of Washington the 8th day of May, 1871, relating to the fisheries," so far as it relates to the articles of said treaty so to be terminated, shall be and stand repealed and be of no force on and after the time of the expiration of said two years.

Approved March 3, 1883.

RETALIATION BILL PROPOSED AND PENDING.

A bill to empower the President to carry out the purposes of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President may deem it his duty to exercise any of the powers given to him by an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, it shall be lawful for the President, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to suspend, in whole or in part, the transportation across the territory of the United States, in bond and without the payment of duty, of goods, wares, and merchandise imported or exported from any foreign country from or to the British dominions in North America.

RETALIATION ACT OF MARCH 3, 1887.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen, visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are or then lately have been unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations, or requirements in respect of such rights, or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports, or places; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places, in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either or all of such cases, it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies, as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere; and also, to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish, or any other product of said dominions or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. The President may, in his discretion, apply such proclamation to any part or to all of the foregoing-named subjects, and may revoke, qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act. Every violation of any such proclamation, or any part thereof, is hereby declared illegal, and all vessels and goods so coming, or being within the waters, ports, or places of the United States contrary to such proclamation shall be forfeited to the United States; and such forfeiture shall be enforced and proceeded upon in the same manner and with the same effect as in the case of vessels or goods whose importation or coming to or being in the waters or ports of the United States contrary to law may now be enforced and proceeded upon. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or such proclamation of the President made in pursuance hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

ARTICLE XXIX OF THE TREATY OF 1871.

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports of the United States which have been or may, from time to time, be specially designated by the President of the United States and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions through the territory of the United States for export from the said ports of the United States.

It is further agreed that, for the like period, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at any of the ports of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America and destined for the United States may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the said possessions, under such rules and regulations and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the governments of the said possessions may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without payment of duties, from the United States through the said possessions to other places in the United States or for export from ports in the said possessions.

Article XXXIII does not mention Article XXIX, but contains a provision that Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry them into operation shall be passed by the legislative bodies of the different countries concerned therein, and that—

"They shall remain in force for the period of ten years from the date in which they may come into operation, and further until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same."

Mr. HITT introduced the following joint resolution:

Joint resolution to promote commercial union with Canada.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever it shall be duly certified to the President of the United States that the Government of the Dominion of Canada has declared a desire to establish commercial union with the United States, having a uniform revenue system, like internal taxes to be collected, and like import duties to be imposed on articles brought into either country from other nations, with no duties upon trade between the United States and Canada, he shall appoint three commissioners to meet those who may be likewise designated to represent the Government of Canada, to prepare a plan for the assimilation of the import duties and internal revenue taxes of the two countries, and an equitable division of receipts, in a commercial union; and said commissioners shall report to the President, who shall lay the report before Congress.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, the honor of our country must always be asserted with the decorum which becomes her dignity. She is strong, so strong that she may be forbearing without being suspected of cowardice; patient, without incurring the reproach of ignorance. I firmly believe that she is the most beneficent presence in the ages. I would have all her children believe this. I would have them so proud of her that they will not wrong any other nation—so loving that they will submit to no wrong to her.

It is in this spirit that we ought to treat the Canadian people. It is our interest, and their interest, that their relations with us shall be friendly. Our contiguity is, of itself, a good reason for this. Along the northern frontier the commerce of the two countries runs in the same channels. The great lakes and rivers are not barriers, but bonds of union. From the headwaters of Lake Superior to the mouth of the St. Lawrence nature has created highways for millions of people, routes of travel and traffic for vast areas of country lying on both sides of the national boundary line.

From the far West, through Illinois, Michigan, Ontario, and New York is the easiest country for railroad construction to the seaboard north of the Ohio River—a country already traversed by railways and destined to be crowded with many more as the West grows to the supremacy of her power. And so, through Minnesota, Wisconsin, the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, across the Falls of St. Mary's, through Ontario and New York or Maine to the ocean, other lines stretch from west to east, invited by the necessities of all civilization.

Surely the areas traversed by these water ways and connected by these railways are so identical in all natural features, topography, soil, climate, productions, that they were meant by nature for one country, and are only under different flags by the rude divorcement of man.

Sir, I can not exaggerate the greatness in all natural resources of these areas. They constitute one vast region, a land of wonders, of gold and silver and all the useful metals, of grain and lumber and fisheries, of lakes and rivers, of water-power already chanting the welcome of coming industry, of vast spaces of fertile soil tempting the husbandman and glowing with the promise of happy homes. Here the frosts of winter lend vigor to men and ripen them to high achievement.

Here, sir, are every material and element for the comfort of men and the power of an empire. "Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder." I would be loath, very loath, to do aught to bring discord into this paradise. I would, if I could, remember only the bonds of union, forged and welded by the hand of nature. I would, if I could, realize the hope of one flag over this vast area. That hope, now feeble, may yet blaze upon the world in a sunburst of accomplishment; but not to-day, not until the time when America, as she ought, has become the mistress of the seas and her great rival, now dominating Canada, shall fall behind her in the march of commerce. Rival, sir, I say; for England is our rival, despite all the trash about Milton and Shakespeare and one blood and one language, as if the relations of nations could flow in the liquid eloquence of sonnets and the peace of the world be maintained by the rules of syntax.

I say, sir, we may not to-day hope for that common nationality which will be so full of blessing to Canada and to the United States. We must be content now with peace and good-will, if we can have peace and good-will, and strive for a commercial union which will do homage to the law which nature has imposed on the continent. Let me emphasize it, sir. The desire of the American people is peace and good-will with the Canadian people, and it will not be our fault if there is an unfriendly act, nay, even an unfriendly thought on this side of the line.

But, sir, it has happened that we have been obliged to be very patient with our neighbors. Perhaps they have mistaken this for fear. Perhaps they think we are so stupid that we do not know when we are unjustly treated. Perhaps the intense "jingoism" of the party in power in the Dominion believes in its own cuteness to drive hard bargains. I know not how that is; but I do know we have been unjustly treated. I will not go back to the treaty of 1818, nor recapitulate the evasions and misconstructions by which they stripped it of all beneficial power for us.

I will even pass over that period of peril for our country and our institutions when Canada, inflamed with the wicked hope of England that the Union of these States might perish, insulted the North and cajoled the South. Thank God, the peril is past, and all the children of the Union are here under the old roof-tree united, determined to uphold the dignity of the nation. [Applause.]

I pass all this by. Though no statutes of limitation can run against memory, national honor is epitomized in treaties, because the nation's word has been plighted, and in 1871 we made a treaty embracing all points at issue with England concerning Canada. It is the violation of that treaty which has evoked this high debate.

That it has been violated is not a question of controversy here to-day; violated by the Canadians, not by us; violated in its fisheries and in its canal articles; violated brutally as to the first, most meanly as to the last. I know of no just complaint the Canadians have against us; but, sir, the ink was hardly dry upon the treaty before complaints of outrage began to pour in to the Department of State. The history of the treaty up to the time of the passage of the joint resolution of March 3, 1883, is but a repetition of unfriendly acts on their part and of temperate expostulation on ours.

They refused the ordinary amenities of commerce to our seamen; they set afloat armed vessels to hunt our fishermen on the high seas; they captured American citizens and American ships; they hauled down the American flag. At last they exhausted our patience, and in 1883 Congress passed judgment on the whole matter, decided that they had wronged us, by the joint resolution directing notice of termination under the thirty-third article of the treaty, and again, in 1887, by the retaliation act. I regard that resolution and act as the voice of the American people.

To-day, by reason of the joint resolution and the notice given under it, every provision of the treaty relating to the fisheries and dependent on Article XXXIII is dead. Why they are dead, what was the "manner of their taking off," is of great concern to us, because, representing the dignity of the nation, we must be right, and because they involve the question what articles are dependent on Article XXXIII and whether our transit relations with Canada are still governed by Article XXIX of the treaty or by the statutes of 1866.

Now, sir, my position is that every right granted to continue during the term mentioned in Article XXXIII was abrogated when the articles from XVIII to XXV inclusive and Article XXX were terminated by the two years' notice.

Article XXXIII is as follows, namely:

ARTICLE XXXIII.

The foregoing Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of this treaty shall take effect as soon as the laws required to carry them into operation shall have been passed by the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, by the Parliament of Canada, and by the Legislature of Prince Edward's Island on the one hand, and by the Congress of the United States on the other. Such assent having been given, the said articles shall remain in force for the period of ten years from the date at which they may come into operation; and further until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same; each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said period of ten years or at any time afterward.

The duration of the articles mentioned in Article XXXIII is the test of the duration of the others, and among them of Article XXIX, the transit article.

Which are the articles dependent on Article XXXIII? They are all articles which are to endure, according to their language, "for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII."

An examination of the treaty will disclose that these are Articles XVIII and XIX, relative to fishing on the shores of the respective countries; Article XXI, which relates to the admission of fish into the respective countries free of duty; Article XXVIII, relative to the navigation of Lake Michigan; Article XXIX, which is the transit article; and Article XXX, granting certain rights to Canadian and American vessels on the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes.

Sir, before the treaty of 1871 went into force both Canada and the United States had provisions on their statute-books embodying practically the details of Article XXIX. A system of transportation in bond was in existence, founded on local enactments. There was no necessity for either country to legislate on the subject, as in the case of Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX. The system would probably continue, as a matter of international comity, regardless of the fate of the treaty, and during the time necessary to pass the laws required to carry the fisheries articles into operation. Hence the term of years prescribed in Article XXIX is made to commence when these articles become operative.

If they had never become operative, Article XXIX would have been as if it had never been conceived. Can there be any doubt of it? The language is not obscure. The term, ten years, the only term mentioned in the treaty, has a definite beginning, namely, the time when certain legislation is perfected, and a definite ending; that is, ten years after that time. If there had been no beginning to the operation of the other articles, there would have been no term to embrace Article XXIX.

Why, sir, we are dealing with a legal matter, in which legal terms are used and legal processes of construction must be resorted to. The ten years begin to run with the operation of the articles named in Article XXXIII—the ten years, the "term" prescribed in Article XXIX. The last article and the article concerning Lake Michigan did not go into effect regardless of the time when Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX, went into effect.

The true construction is the simple one, which would be applied to a grant of property or franchises. It is as if a term of years for two pieces of property were expressed to be during the continuance of the term of certain other property.

Now, sir, the language of the article is very singular if it does not mean that the beginning and end of all the privileges granted for a term of years were to be coincident with the duration of the articles specified in Article XXXIII. That article treats the laws required to put them into force as an "assent," and prescribes "such assent having been given, the said articles" (that is, Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX) "shall remain in force for the period of ten years from the date at which they may come into operation."

Is it not plain that the ten years, the "term" of Article XXIX, began with the operation of these articles?

But, sir, the article proceeds to prescribe that they shall be in force not only ten years, but "further until the expiration of two years after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same;" that is, of its wish to terminate Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX.

Not a word here about the transit article or the Lake Michigan article. The term of their existence is the "term mentioned in Article XXXIII," and the beginning and ending of that term is fixed by the fate of the other articles.

But, sir, there is no doubt about this matter; both Canada and the United States have given it a practical construction. The act of Congress approved March 1, 1873, passed under the thirty-third article of the treaty, proceeds in all its parts on that construction. In its first section it enacts that Article XXI shall go into force when the assent required by Article XXXIII is granted by Canada. In section 2 it admits Newfoundland to the benefits of the treaty on the same condition. In section 3 it prescribes that transit in bond may be made across our territory on the same conditions. In section 4 the same condition is made the foundation of the operation of Article XXX.

This is a legislative construction of the meaning of the treaty, and the Supreme Court has decided that such a construction is authority. In the "Head-money cases" (112 United States Reports) the decisions are epitomized and the power of Congress to determine what a treaty means is held to be beyond question. Canad a, too, has acquiesced in this construction. Her refusal since 1880 to permit our fish, brought to her ports, to be carried across her country can only be justified on the ground that Article XXIX was terminated by the notice given under the joint resolution of 1883.

In my opinion she had a right to do this, for with the termination of Article XXIX the subject of transit reverted to the state it was in before the treaty, and was only regulated by the local laws of the respective countries. That, sir, is the state it is in to-day. We need not then seek for any justification of the bill before us. We had by the terms of the treaty a clear right, of our mere pleasure, to terminate certain of its articles. We exercised that right. Still, sir, we did not repeal our transit laws in whole or in part. They were before the treaty. They exist after it. They were conceived in a spirit of neighborly friendship; but they are our private concern. If Canada refuses to reciprocate them, we may repeal or suspend them without just offense to her.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the course of his remarks the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], for whom I have great respect, arraigned the President for not exercising a power which the gentleman contends he possesses under the law of 1887. I would call his attention to the fact that this is a bill giving power to suspend the transit of goods in bond across our country, not only from but to Canada. In that regard it enlarges the provisions of the act of 1887 clear beyond any apprehension which the gentleman has of its effect. More than that, his construction of the act of 1887, as a matter of law, is radically wrong. The law does not mean what he thinks it does. There is no such power given to the President under the law of 1887 as the gentleman thinks.

The gentleman is not only wrong in his opinion of the President's action, but of the law, according to my construction; but the transit laws of 1866 are in no manner involved in or touched by this bill. The law applies merely to Canadian goods—goods belonging to Canadians, no matter how the Canadians got them—to the products of the Canadian soil or the products of their manufacture or what they may buy. If a proclamation was issued under the law of 1887 it would in no way prevent any American at any American port from carrying his goods into any place of Canada, shipping them through Canada, through Michigan, or anywhere through the West to their destination whatever it might be. The language, it seems to me, admits of no other construction. A man could purchase his goods in England, Spain, France, or any country beyond seas, bring them to a Canadian port and ship them through Canada to the United States. It is Canadian goods only which the act of 1887 is directed against.

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Certainly I will. I have refrained from saying some things I would have said, because I did not know I had the honor of the gentleman's attention. I have not made so good a speech as I should have made if I had supposed the gentleman was listening to me. I am pleased to hear from the gentleman, because I have several other remarks which I would be glad to have him hear.

Mr. HITT. Does the gentleman think that the words "or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States," have any meaning?

Mr. CHIPMAN. That is exactly what I am talking about; that is the very point I am trying to elucidate.

Mr. HITT. I ask you, do you think those phrases are meant merely to repeat each other, or is one of them an addition to the meaning expressed by the other?

Mr. CHIPMAN. If the gentleman had heard my remarks——

Mr. HITT. I listened to the gentleman.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The clauses are an addition one to the other. The goods may be the product of Canada, or they may become the property of some one in Canada. The reference is to goods coming from Canada, not goods coming from England, not goods coming from France, not goods coming from beyond the sea, not goods brought into a Canadian port for the purpose of transit under our transit laws of 1866 across the territory of Canada. The goods referred to are goods coming from Canada and goods produced in Canada or belonging to Canadian people. Why, sir, under the construction of my friend from Illinois, if American goods were shipped at Niagara Falls, in New York, to take either of the great routes to our frontier, they would have to be treated under the statute of 1887 as goods "coming" from Canada.

My friend has a very airy way of treating legal questions as "quibbles." He speaks of the acuteness with which we seek to make defense of thieves. It struck me it was rather cavalier to dispose of a great question in that way. That may be the way in which these things are done in the sublimated realms of diplomacy. There may be a purer ether than we ordinary people, "of the earth earthy," conceive of. But in our work-a-day way, we believe that words mean something, that laws have power, and that their interpretation should everywhere be approached with intelligence on the one hand, and with the greatest respect on the other.

[The hour of adjournment being reached, the House, by unanimous consent, requested the gentleman to go on.]

Mr. CHIPMAN. I do not know about going on. I am afraid I am talking too long. [Cries of "Go on!"] I will not keep you long.

My friend, the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT]—and I will only detain the House about five minutes longer—he pretends to speak here in behalf of the great Northwest. I come from the great Northwest. The hands may be the hands of Esau, but the voice is the voice of Jacob. It is not the voice of the Northwest. [Applause.] The Northwest does not desire, nay, the Northwest is protesting against a proclamation enforcing the clause of the retailiation act which the gentleman says the President ought to enforce. It is a clause whereby our trade will be broken up, and if the President had issued a proclamation under it, from one end of the Northwest to the other his name would have been a by-word and reproach, because he would have done a wicked thing. He did what you and your people in Illinois wished done, and what is necessary to our Northwestern trade and commerce and prosperity. He has done no rash or foolish thing.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CHIPMAN. No, I think I will not; I have watched you all through this session. You never ask a question that has anything to do with the subject under discussion. I have watched you closely. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAYNE. You will find that out later.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I have no doubt you can make people laugh, I have no doubt you may be abusive, but I am in a hurry and I desire to talk sense. [Laughter.]

Besides, this is not your fight. I am replying to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], and one at a time is enough, but two to one is one too many. [Renewed laughter.]

The gentleman [Mr. HITT] finds fault with something that Mr. Bayard has said. I wish I had time to follow that up to its conclusion, but I will simply say here that with the exception of one State, and that the State of Pennsylvania, from which the gentleman comes who is so anxious to ask me a question, with the exception of that one State, out of all the nine States which debouch upon the lakes, there is not one that does not desire free trade and commercial union with Canada. Indeed, one of the most eloquent and able gentlemen on your side, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], has been the high priest and apostle of that doctrine, has gone from one end of the great West to the other and throughout Canada preaching it.

It is the settled, earnest desire of the Northwest to have free trade with Canada, and if they have anything to do with shaping their own destiny, if they have any potency in determining that question, the people of that section will have absolute free trade with Canada. [Applause.]

I wish I had more time [cries of "Go on!"], but I will not detain you longer. [Cries of "Go on!"] No, I wish to finish to-night.

I have stated only two points. I had about a dozen more, so many mistakes did the gentleman make, but I think I will let them go; you have been patient enough already.

I do not care to go into the subject of the canals. Above Lake Erie, through the Lime Kiln crossing, through the St. Clair Flats Canal, through Hay Lake and the canal around the Falls of St. Mary, our money, our skill and enterprise have created paths of commerce. We have not shut them up against the Canadian marine, but though our canals are now too crowded for our own convenience we have loyally shared their benefits with our neighbors. Their discrimination against our marine under the mean subterfuge of charging the same rate to their own as to ours and giving their own a rebate needs no comment. It is one of the acts which belittle a people.

Sir, I have heard doubts expressed as to our action here. The press speaks of those who would give England some notice before the President issues a proclamation under this bill if it becomes a law. I believe this is esteemed to be some sort of a diplomatic etiquette. Thank God, we have no diplomatic corps in the European sense, and that in the estimation of our people the nearer a man approaches a diplomat in form the nearer he is akin to a fool, and the more he approaches one in substance the nearer he is to a knave. [Great laughter and applause.] But, sir, our own statutes are not the subject of foreign interference. We are not by the laws of nations compelled to inform any other power what may or may not be transported across our territory.

For one, sir, I am not inclined to be more polite to England than self-respect and strict law require. Her foot has been on every weak neck. She has pursued her commercial interests with the brutality of force or the meannesses of diplomacy, as the exigency might demand. In India, from the time of Clyde and Hastings; at the Cape, among the Zulus; in Ireland, among a people who are now bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, she has been selfish and pitiless. Even the other day she kidnapped a poor African chief and imprisoned him on one of her West India Islands. She is the monster money-changer in the temple of God's earth. Sir, what the honor of our country demands I will concede to her; not an atom more. Here we stand to-day representatives of a nation which is in the right. This bill is in the pathway of our duty. I shall vote for it with a stout heart and clear conscience. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

During the delivery of the above speech, on motion of Mr. McCREARY, by unanimous consent, the session was extended beyond 5 o'clock and until Mr. CHIPMAN had concluded his remarks.

WILLIAM R. ROGERS.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 511, a bill (H. R. 11362) for the relief of William R. Rogers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The bill H. R. 511 was ordered to be laid on the table.

And then, on motion of Mr. McCREARY (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

CIRCUIT-COURT POWERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3234) to abolish circuit-court powers of certain district courts of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. I have looked at the amendment of the House. It is in substance an entirely new bill providing simply for a rehearing of questions of law in capital cases. I do not suppose it is necessary to have the amendment read. I think it had better be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary before the Senate is asked to take action upon it.

The bill with the House amendment was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FORT MISSOULA MILITARY RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the commanding officer of Fort Missoula, Montana, and the indorsements thereon, relative to the status of the title to the lands embraced within the present limits of the military reservation at that point, and recommending certain legislation in regard thereto; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Huse, lately composing the firm of J. W. Parrish & Co., of St. Louis, Mo.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 3516) to further suspend the operation of section 5574 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, Title LXXII, in relation to guano islands; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PALMER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3517) granting a pension to Jane Sullivan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 3521) granting an increase of pension to James Shaahan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. PLUMB submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PROPOSED LAND OFFICE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. STEWART. I offer a resolution, which I ask may be read for information and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five members of the Senate be appointed by the Presiding Officer for the purpose of investigating—

1. Whether there has been any improper use of the moneys appropriated by Congress for the purpose of protecting timber on the public lands, investigating fraudulent claims to the public lands, or for any other purpose connected with the administration of the General Land Office.

2. Whether any fraudulent practices, whereby the public lands are illegally acquired, exist, and whether the same are knowingly tolerated by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

3. Whether any discriminations have been made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or any of his subordinates, between citizens of the United States in investigating claims to the public lands or in canceling or setting aside applications to buy or enter public lands.

4. Whether there have been any discriminations between persons who have entered upon or fenced the public lands, in the recommendations, prosecutions, or the removal of fences, or any other matter connected therewith, and if all such persons have been treated alike, or whether some have been allowed to illegally occupy the public lands while others have been required to remove therefrom.

5. Whether there have been any secret compromises between the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or any of his subordinates, and influential persons or corporations, whereby the Government of the United States has been defrauded and illegal claims to lands patented.

6. Whether any prosecutions have been recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office at the instance of persons, or their attorneys or agents, having or claiming an interest in the lands to be recovered adverse to the United States.

7. Whether the name of the United States has been improperly used on the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to prosecute citizens of the United States for any improper purpose.

8. Whether the mode of conducting the secret service in the General Land Office is fair and impartial, affording to citizens whose rights are affected thereby a fair and reasonable opportunity to be heard before decisions are rendered against them, and whether settlers on the public lands are prevented from obtaining pre-emptions and homesteads by secret manipulations of agents or employés of the General Land Office.

9. Whether the expenses and annoyances to settlers by the operations of the secret service in the General Land Office are retarding the growth and prosperity of the States and Territories where the lands are situated.

And that said committee or any subcommittee thereof shall have power to employ a clerk and stenographer, subpœna witnesses, send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and sit during the sessions of the Senate and vacation of Congress at such places as it may deem advisable. The expenses of said committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Said committee shall have power to report by bill or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred, under the rules, to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. VEST. Why should the resolution go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Because it imposes a charge upon the contingent fund of the Senate, and the rule provides that in all such cases a resolution shall be referred to that committee.

Mr. VEST. Ought it not to go first to the Committee on Public Lands in order to ascertain and report as to the propriety of these investigations, and then as a subsequent proceeding, as to the clause which audits the expenses, it should go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

I simply want to observe that if the resolution is passed it would entail the expense of employing a large additional clerical force, and an examination that would extend through months if not years.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would advise the Senator from Missouri that he may make a motion to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands, but the rule requires that it shall go to the other committee some time before it is acted upon.

Mr. VEST. I may be mistaken in regard to the practice of the Senate, but my impression is that the first and preliminary question is as to the propriety of the investigation, and then if money is to be expended out of the contingent fund of the Senate in sending for witnesses and paying for the services of the employés attending the committee, etc., the resolution must go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That was my experience with the committee that was raised on my motion by a resolution in regard to the meat product of the United States. I was advised by the highest parliamentary authority here that it would be necessary, as to that clause of it which expended money for the necessary expenses of the committee to be taken out of the contingent fund, that it should go finally before that committee. But here we commit ourselves, as I understand it, to the necessity for this examination, or these examinations, for there seems to be more than a dozen of them, by sending simply the question of the payment of the money to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. STEWART. I do not so regard it at all. All other resolutions proposing investigations have gone first to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, and the question as to the propriety of passing the resolution comes up when the resolution is reported back from that committee.

I do not wish to occupy the time this morning, because the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] desires to speak. When the resolution comes back from the Committee on Contingent Expenses, if they report favorably, I shall be able to discuss the propriety of the investigation and to show the necessity for it. I could do it now, but I would rather not.

I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I shall not regard the report of the Committee on Contingent Expenses as precluding any other motion which may be made to send the resolution to the Committee on Public Lands when it comes back.

Mr. VEST. Aside from this specific case I am a little interested myself to know what is the practice of the Senate and what would be the result of the report of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the fourth paragraph of Rule XXV read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

RULE XXV.

* * * * * * * *

A Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to consist of three Senators, to which shall be referred all resolutions directing the payment of money out of the contingent fund of the Senate, or creating a charge upon the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule is peremptory.

Mr. VEST. I have no doubt that at some time the resolution would have to go to that committee, but my inquiry extends to another point. I should like to know whether every resolution proposing an investigation must first go to that committee and if the report of that committee is conclusive as to the propriety of the investigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. STEWART. It is not.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that after the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate reports, then a motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Public Lands would be perfectly in order, and he could test the question then as to whether it should go to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion would undoubtedly be in order under the rules. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, if there be no objection.

TREATY WITH CHINA.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit the following resolution and ask that it be considered, if there be no objection:

Resolved, That the President is requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the Senate whether the recent treaty with China and the amendments adopted by the Senate have been ratified by the Emperor of China.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I perhaps ought to say a word in respect to the provisions of the resolution. After what was said on the floor yesterday and the day before, it is manifestly due to the dignity of the Senate and the good order and conduct of our affairs that we should have official information from the President of the United States in regard to the subject-matter of the Chinese treaty before proceeding further. The statement made yesterday does not even seem to come to us from official channels. The resolution has been adopted, and I hope it will be answered to-day. It can be answered to-day as well as in a fortnight's time.

TOLLS ON GOODS EXPORTED TO CANADA.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Has any answer come to the resolution of the Senate passed a week or more ago asking the President for correspondence in regard to the observance by Canada of the provisions of the treaty of 1871 relating to tolls?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No answer to that resolution has been received.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that from the necessity of the case it is a matter which could be answered by the executive department in a single day. If no such correspondence was had, why not state it? If there be such correspondence, copies of it can be sent. I desire to call the attention of the Senate in this way, and of the President himself, to the reasons for a prompt answer to that request.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 6, 12, 18, 19, 22, 24, and 27.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 20, 21, 23, 26, 28, 29, 30, 31, and 34, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "charge," in line 19, page 5 of the bill, the words "or over any of the bond-aided Pacific railroads;" strike out in line 21, same page, the words "last-named railroad," and insert in lieu thereof the word "railroads;" and in lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said Senate amendment insert the following:

"And provided further, That the transportation furnished by the Quartermaster's Department to officers traveling without troops shall be limited to transportation in kind, not including sleeping or parlor car accommodations over free roads, over bond-aided Pacific railroads, and by conveyance belonging to the said department."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$42,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 32, 33, and 35 the committee of conference has been unable to agree.

W. B. ALLISON,
P. B. PLUMB,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
R. W. TOWNSHEND,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate concur in the report.

Mr. PLATT. We get very little idea of the progress which has been made by the committee of conference from the reading of the conference report, it simply referring to the amendments by numbers. I wish the Senator from Iowa would tell us in a short statement to what the conferees have agreed and to what they have not agreed.

Mr. ALLISON. The amendments agreed upon are the amendments in detail. The amendments not agreed on are the amendments relating to the question of public defense in respect to fortifications, etc.

Mr. PLATT. What is the amendment to which a further amendment has been agreed to, relating to the Canadian Pacific road? I did not catch it.

Mr. ALLISON. There is nothing in the bill relating to the Canadian Pacific road. The Senate inserted a provision prohibiting the Quartermaster's Department from furnishing transportation to officers who are traveling without troops, otherwise than by conveyance belonging to the department. On a further examination of the amendment it was found that we ought also to exclude the land-grant roads and the Pacific railroads, so that transportation could be furnished by the Quartermaster's department on those lines, and the necessary changes were made to accomplish that object.

Mr. PLATT. I mistook the reading. I thought it was read as an item relating to the Canadian Pacific road.

Mr. ALLISON. It has relation only to land-grant roads and the Pacific railroads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate agree to the request of the House of Representatives for a further conference on the amendments not agreed upon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees of the further conference on the part of the Senate, and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. GORMAN were appointed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAYERS, Mr. FORNEY, and Mr. BUTTERWORTH as managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11087) to establish a circuit and district court at Johnson City, Tenn., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 2371) granting a pension to Jacob Pitner;

A bill (S. 2716) granting a pension to Carl M. Schwantes;

A bill (S. 2871) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah J. Martin;

A bill (S. 3035) to grant a pension to William Thields;

A bill (S. 3118) for the relief of Mathew O. Regan;

A bill (S. 3178) to remove the political disabilities of William L. Bradford; and

A bill (S. 3364) to provide for an American register for the steamer Saginaw, of New York.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FARWELL. In pursuance of the notice I gave yesterday, I move to take up Order of Business 2206.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not feel at liberty to entertain that motion now, unanimous consent having been given that at the close of the formal morning business the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] should be entitled to address the Senate on the resolution of the Senator from New Hamphire [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. FARWELL. It will take but a moment to dispose of the resolution reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia. I ask unanimous consent to call it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Consent must be given by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PASCO. If the formal morning business is closed, I will take the floor and yield to the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], on which the Senator from Florida is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Florida said he would yield to the Senator from Illinois. I ask both the Senators if they will do me the kindness to yield to me in order that I may dispose of a motion to reconsider, with the declaration that if it takes three minutes I shall not ask for further indulgence.

Mr. PASCO. I am willing to yield.

CHURCH OF ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill (H. R. 1073) for the relief of the Roman Catholic Church of St. Peter and St. Paul at Chattanooga, Tenn., was passed by the Senate, when the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] moved to reconsider the vote by which it was passed, because he proposes to amend the bill in one of its verbal expressions. I shall have no objection to the amendment except that it involves the necessity of the bill going back to the other House, and that I do not propose to debate. I ask that the motion of the Senator from Oregon to reconsider be now taken up and disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 1073) for the relief of the Roman Catholic Church of St. Peter and St. Paul at Chattanooga, Tenn., was passed. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion to reconsider?

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading will also be reconsidered, if there be no objection; and the bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to amend the bill, in line 14, on page 2, by striking out the three words "between the States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 14, after the word "war," it is proposed to strike out the words "between the States;" so as to read:

For stone and all other building materials taken and used during the war of 1861, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. HARRIS were appointed.

DISTRICT ELECTRIC WIRES.

Mr. FARWELL. I now call up Order of Business 2206.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PASCO. I yield with the understanding that the matter will not lead to discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution reported adversely by Mr. FARWELL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, September 3, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to revoke any permit granted for the erection of overhead electric wires.

Mr. FARWELL. I move that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois to postpone the resolution indefinitely.

Mr. CALL. I think that is the resolution which was discussed at some length some time ago upon the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], and by a vote of the Senate the matter was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with a decided expression of opinion on the part of Senators in favor of revoking any authority that had been given.

Mr. FARWELL. If my friend from Florida will permit the short report to be read which is made on this subject, I think he will interpose no further objection. I call for the reading of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report submitted by Mr. FARWELL September 3, 1888, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the order of the Senate referring letter of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, with instructions to report a resolution requesting the commissioners to revoke any permit granted for the erection of overhead electric wires, report:

The Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company was duly incorporated by act of Congress approved June 19, 1888. The company was duly organized under its charter, and in good faith entered into contracts for the entire construction and equipment of the road, contracts amounting to some $53,000. The act of incorporation authorized the use of electricity as a motive power. A permit was obtained from the District commissioners, contracts made for the electrical equipment, and work was in progress at the time this resolution was introduced.

After a full investigation of the subject the committee recommend that the resolution herewith reported by order of the Senate do not pass.

The testimony before the committee shows that an electrical current of 400 or 500 volts potential is not dangerous to human life. The testimony is overwhelming and conclusive on this point. The current to be used on the Eckington road will have a potential of about 400 volts.

The testimony shows that under-ground conductors cost about ten times as much as overhead conductors, and that it is doubtful whether any form of conduit would operate successfully and satisfactorily on this unpaved street. About 1 mile of the road is within the city limits. It is doubtful whether the authorized capital stock would suffice to construct this mile of double track with an under-ground conduit and equip the balance of the road.

The route is through a section of the city but little improved, many squares being entirely destitute of buildings of any kind. All the streets, roads, and avenues on which the tracks are to be laid are now without pavements. Neat ornamental iron poles are to be used with a cluster of electric lights on every other pole.

As it has been shown that there is no danger in overhead lines, that the poles and wires are but little if any obstruction on the street, that overhead lines have been generally adopted, and are generally successful, while conduits are as yet somewhat of an experiment, that the great cost of the conduit system, as well as the unpaved condition of the streets makes it impracticable in the present case, your committee fail to see any reason why the Senate should interfere with the construction of this road, the officers of which have been proceeding in good faith, in strict compliance with the law, and with the desire of improving the means and methods of transporting the public in the northeast section of the District.

Your committee deem it of great interest to the District that the electrical system of propelling street-cars should have a fair trial, as it is well known that the street-car system of Washington is not up to the standard of other cities of equal size.

Congress has reserved the right to amend and alter the charter of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company, and should the overhead electrical system after a fair trial prove unsatisfactory, it is then time for such action on the part of Congress as is contemplated by the resolution.

The testimony taken by the committee is herewith appended.

Mr. FARWELL. I do not care to have the testimony read. The report of the committee is a unanimous one. I ask for a vote on my motion that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the resolution reported by the committee be, in accordance with its recommendation, indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CALL. I do not think this matter ought to be pressed in the absence of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. I suggest that the resolution be allowed to stand until his return. For myself I should make no objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Florida will allow me, I will state that I am informed the Senator from Vermont will be absent for about a week. Under the provision in the District appropriation bill if this work is not done before the 15th of September it can not be done at all, and the delay asked by the Senator from Florida is simply the defeat of the particular parties interested in that enterprise.

Mr. CALL. I shall not make any further opposition to it. I am sensible of the fact that the city of Washington is one of the most corporation-ridden communities in the world, and many acts of incorporation are heedlessly passed, in my opinion. The fact that certain parties may lose their contracts ought not to be considered in a matter of this kind where the public interest is concerned. But as the act of incorporation in this case contains a provision reserving the power on the part of Congress to alter and amend it, I shall make no further opposition to the indefinite postponement of the resolution.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

Mr. PASCO. If this matter is to lead to discussion I shall ask that it be postponed until after I conclude my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has a right to call for the regular order.

Mr. VEST. I have no extended remarks to make. I simply wish to prefer a request that this matter shall go over until to-morrow. I have some papers bearing upon it, which I left at my residence this morning, and I want to refer to them, and I want to examine the report of the committee and the evidence, which I have not had time to do. I ask to have the resolution go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. FARWELL. Will my friend call it up then? I may not be here.

Mr. VEST. I have not the slightest objection; but I suppose the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] will take that task upon himself. If he is absent and the Senator from Illinois also, I will pledge the Senator from Illinois to call it up.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be agreed that it be the first business to-morrow.

Mr. FARWELL. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the consideration of this resolution be resumed to-morrow morning at the conclusion of the routine business. Is there objection?

Mr. TELLER. I suppose that will be with the understanding that it shall not interfere with the bill we have under consideration.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill will not come up until 2 o'clock under the rules anyway.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. There is another resolution, as I understand, reported by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] pending before the Senate relating to the wires for electric lights. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that that resolution be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia. My purpose in asking that is this, certain companies report that they have invested a large amount of money in their enterprises; that they have expended between four and five hundred thousand dollars in an honest effort to organize the system of electric lighting; that they have spent $30,000 in an effort to discover some means of conducting electricity underground, and they desire before there is any action taken on the report by the Senate to have the committee give them a hearing, and hear what they have to say.

It occurs to me it is nothing but common fairness that these people who have a large amount of money invested in this enterprise shall have a hearing by the committee before there is any positive action on the part of the Senate, and for that reason I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I presume there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution (S. R. 105) to restrain the erection or maintenance of overhead electric motive power and electric-light wires in the cities of Washington and Georgetown may be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE LOUISIANA ELECTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. CHANDLER July 19, 1888, in reference to the election held in Louisiana April 17, 1888.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the Senator from Florida proceeds, he will permit me to say that my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER], the author of this resolution, and to whom I have some reason to suppose the Senator may have occasion to advert in the course of his remarks, is necessarily absent from the city, and will not be here until the first of next week. The Senator from Florida has kindly postponed his speech several times, and I do not feel that I have a right to ask him to do so any longer. I simply desire that it may appear of record that my colleague is absent.

Mr. PASCO. I was about to preface my remarks with the statement that I had not desired to proceed in the absence of the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], but learning that his absence will continue some time longer, and learning also from his colleague [Mr. BLAIR] that he does not desire that it should be postponed longer in consequence of the absence of the junior Senator as far as speeches being made upon the resolution are concerned, and also in view of the fact that he will have abundant opportunity to reply to anything I may say after his return, I have decided not to postpone further the remarks which I propose to submit.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not like to be understood as saying that I did not desire a further postponement, but I think it would be taxing the courtesy of the Senator from Florida to ask it.

Mr. PASCO. I will put it upon that ground, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, the undigested miscellaneous matter collected by the junior Senator from New Hampshire, or under his supervision, does more credit to his industry than to his judgment. He seems to be desirous of emulating the zeal and energy of his colleague, but there is this difference between them: The senior Senator has often exerted himself to benefit the people of the South, to extend the advantages of education, to unite them in efforts for the improvement of the condition of the ignorant and the advancement of the colored race to a higher and better intellectual and moral condition; the junior Senator strives to kindle anew the smoldering embers of the past, to revive the bitterness and ill-will that is fast fading into forgetfulness, and to create fresh antagonisms between the people of different races in the South, who are for the most part living together in friendly and peaceful relations.

No lover of his country can sincerely desire to see the Southern States remanded to the condition which followed the second reconstruction. It is the darkest chapter in the history of the country. States were robbed by political adventurers and burdens placed upon the industry of the people which will be felt for generations. Ill-will and bitterness and prejudice were stirred up for selfish and partisan purposes between the white and black people. Men who had no residence or interest in these unfortunate States aspired to and reached the highest positions of honor and trust and impudently pretended to represent the people. The black man was induced by flattery and deception to band against his old friends, and the social and business relations of society were disturbed and overthrown. Elections were carried without regard to the votes that were cast. Crime went unpunished; and the condition of the Southern States became so deplorable that it at last roused the slumbering indifference of the people of the North.

To give some idea of the condition of things in the State which I have the honor in part to represent during the period referred to, I submit a recent letter written by Harrison Reed, the first governor under the reconstruction acts of Congress, to the editor of a new Republican paper published at Tallahassee by a colored man.

Mr. Reed has always been a Republican of the straightest sect, and was in a position to know the truth as to the unfavorable statements he makes with reference to his party friends who elevated him to office. This letter appeared in the Times-Union, the leading daily paper in our State, published at Jacksonville, in its issue of June 19, 1888.

SOUTH JACKSONVILLE, June 8, 1888.

Editor State Capital:

SIR: I am under obligation for the courtesy of a copy of your initial number, the receipt of which brings back the past in vivid review, and recalls a chapter of political experience which, for the honor of mankind, I would be glad never to have opened, but which confirms the doctrine of human depravity to a degree sickening to the philanthropist, and causing him to bow to the Almighty whose power compels even the "wrath of man to praise him."

When I first visited your beautiful city the State, desolated by the war, lay prostrate in the hands of the soldiery, and all classes were looking with anxious longing for the restoration of constitutional government. The old slaveholding aristocracy which had forced the war to maintain its supremacy; the masses who had gallantly sustained the decree of their political lords and fought for a cause which, if successful, was to degrade their own manhood and establish slavery and aristocracy in place of freedom and democracy; the negro who had never before possessed his own manhood; the camp-followers, army bummers, and military adventurers, hunting for place and plunder; the loyal, patriotic citizen who honored the nation and labored for law, order, peace, and good government, all these heterogeneous and antagonistic elements were to be harmonized under a civil government guarantying freedom and equal rights. No master, no slave, no legalized aristocracy or subservient democracy, no class distinctions, but all subject to a common law.

In the wake of the Federal Army came the Freedmen's Bureau, a grand philanthropic conception of the paternal Government, well designed to protect the emancipated slave and educate him in his new responsibilities, but in the hands of unprincipled military adventurers perverted to personal, political, and mercenary purposes, and thus made a curse rather than a blessing, and finally through fraud and corruption demoralizing the freedmen and debauching them to the vilest ends of personal gratification and aggrandizement.

So the "carpet-bagger" became a synonym of disgrace for the Northern immigrant as significant and odious as that of "abolitionist" had been in the days of slavery. Free negroes from the North, educated in deception and adepts in the less reputable characteristics of low demagogues, came in to assist the white "carpet-baggers" and take charge of the churches, schools, and moral and political interests of the colored race. These black saints traded upon the ignorance, superstition, and credulity of the freedmen, and bartered their souls for gain.

And yet under all the adverse circumstances there has been a steady advance in the civilization and education of your race, and nothing gives a better index of this progress than the establishment of newspapers by colored men now qualified for the editorial and mechanical management.

It is a wonderful contrast, the well-fed, well-dressed, intelligent communities of freedmen, with the former squalid assemblages hanging upon the instructions and awaiting the beck of political demagogues and low adventurers who "stole the livery of heaven to serve the devil in."

I congratulate you on your Capital, and assure you that I have lost nothing of my interest in the advancement and prosperity of your race and the material development of that rich and most beautiful section of the State, in behalf of whose interest I sacrificed years of earnest effort and endured the injustice of treacherous allies and unscrupulous political foes. I wish you and your Capital great success in advocating the principles of freedom and equal rights, and in promoting the moral and material progress of the freedmen and their prosperity. In the bonds of true Democracy and Republican equality, I remain,

Very truly and respectfully,

HARRISON REED.

One by one these States threw off the yoke, the governments established by these adventurers in the name of the Republican party fell to pieces, and the Democratic party came into power from Virginia to Texas. The political change was followed by prosperity and peace, and no man can shut his eyes to the fact that the advance and progress that have been made in the southern part of our country during the eleven and a half years since the last of the Southern States came under Democratic rule is without a parallel in that section.

A few figures with reference to Florida will illustrate this.

The assessment of property for taxation in Florida was, in 1876, $29,688,337; in 1887, $84,860,564. The number of miles of railroad in operation was, in 1876, about 500; in 1887, 2,111. The number of schools was, in 1876, 676; in 1887, 2,103. The money expended for their support was, in 1876, $158,846.36; in 1887, $449,299.15.

But the upheaval of society caused by the war and its results, and the social and political revolution which was brought about by the second reconstruction and the carpet-bag governments which were established in the various reconstructed States under it, left behind them disturbed and irritating conditions, and those upon whom the burdens of government were placed found themselves confronted with social and political questions which required the greatest wisdom and prudence to solve. It ought to be a source of congratulation to right-thinking men of all parties that so few mistakes were made, that there has been so much material progress, that kindlier relations were so soon established between the white and black people, and that the capitalists and business men of the North having confidence in the new governments were willing to invest their money with us and aid in the development of what they were pleased to term "the New South."

If we had been endowed with the wisdom of serpents and the harmlessness of doves and the patience of saints perfect peace and tranquillity might have followed. But our people were men with like passions and impulses that influence and control human beings elsewhere. There were, as I have already said, disturbing and irritating conditions still in existence, and here and there they have borne fruit. It would have been in accordance with the history of mankind in other times and in other countries under similar conditions if there had been a large increase of crime and an epidemic of hate and violence. It is creditable to both races who live in the South that this has not been the case in this instance, and that the percentage of crime among us will compare favorably with that of other sections of our common country that have not had like difficulties to contend with, when all the facts and circumstances are taken into consideration.

But there is a large class of people at the North who are displeased because our States have ceased to give Republican majorities. They do not realize how odious the Republican party became in the South because of the misgovernment of our States by those who wore its livery, and they give credence to every slander and misrepresentation that is uttered with reference to our condition. And when some wrong actually occurs and some crime is committed it is heralded abroad, not as affecting simply the community or locality where it happens, but as an index of a state of things existing universally all over the Southern country.

In the days when the carpet-bag element ruled the Southern States election frauds were common. I can speak from my own personal knowledge as to one State. It is doubtful if any fair election took place in Florida from 1868 to 1876. I could fill a volume with well authenticated details if I had time. Force and fraud, repeating and ballot-box stuffing, suppression of returns and miscounting of votes were the order of the day. I propose to give one memorable instance of this further on. My information and investigations have convinced me that these crimes were not confined to Florida.

After such an experience it is quite probable that offenses of a similar nature have been committed here and there since those days by Democrats. But there is no basis for the wholesale charges that are made against the entire South because wrongs have sometimes been committed. If newspaper reports were accepted as true with regard to elections at the North as they are with regard to those at the South, we might readily believe that our entire system of government had failed. But I have no desire to make any attacks upon other States on sectional lines. I simply stand upon a fair defense of my own State and section.

We listened recently for two days to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], who has placed upon the record extracts from newspapers containing accounts of murder, riot, arson, and election frauds alleged to have occurred in different parts of the South during a series of years—some of them in my own State. He has read letters from parties whose names are not given, and so far as the Senate is concerned anonymous, editorials from partisan sheets, and other matter of a similar nature with the avowed purpose of instituting an investigation into the late election in Louisiana and questioning the right of the newly-elected Senators to their seats.

If the investigation were really desired, it would seem to be becoming to reserve the details till they were actually ascertained by legal evidence. There is no need of haste, for one of these Senators will not have to apply for his seat till 1889, the other till 1891. It is unfair and unjust to prejudge the hearing by ex parte and anonymous statements. It can have no other object than to supply campaign material for the Republican party in the present campaign without regard to its truth or falsity. It recalls the letter which was sent in 1874 by Thomas J. Brady to the editor of the Union, Rensselaer, Ind.:

ROOMS OF THE STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE,
Indianapolis, September 3, 1874.

DEAR SIR: I desire to call your attention to the horrible scenes of violence and bloodshed transpiring through the South, and suggest that you give them as great prominence as possible in your paper from this time till after the election.

THOMAS. J. BRADY,
Chairman.

EDITOR OF UNION,
Rensselaer, Indiana.

The Senator has seen fit to trace all the crimes in his catalogue to political causes without a shadow of evidence or a word of proof, and in this way an indictment is drawn against the Democratic party in the entire South and against every Southern State under a Democratic administration, charging them with wholesale crimes against the elective franchise.

An equally effective indictment might be prepared against the Northern States by any industrious man with a pair of scissors and a pot of paste and the files of the Police Gazette and such like repositories of sensational literature. Murder and arson and robbery and crimes against the elective franchise are not sectional. As long as human nature continues unchanged, weakness and passion and lust will be the fruitful sources of crime.

Add a partisan bias and connect a party purpose to each case in the catalogue and an unscrupulous campaign worker might make a strong prima facie case against the peaceful and law-abiding people of Northern communities as has been done against the Southern people.

No such condition of things exists throughout the Southern country as one would naturally believe after reading the partisan scrap-book industriously prepared by the junior Senator from New Hampshire and worked into his recent speech.

The proposed investigation can not be completed before the election, and in the mean time what he has said goes before the country for the use of stump orators, partisan newspaper editors, and campaign managers, with an apparent authenticity, because it appears in the proceedings of the Senate and goes out through the mails under the franks of Senators.

It is a good enough story till after the election and then all interest in the investigation on the part of the Senator who is urging it on will probably cease.

Statements of this kind are made so often and so recklessly by Republican partisans that it is actually believed by many people at the North, who have not the disposition or the energy to investigate for themselves, that honest elections are unknown throughout the South, that it is dangerous to advocate the principles of the Republican party there, and unsafe to vote the Republican ticket on election days, and that the votes of Republicans when cast are not fairly counted, but are systematically and willfully miscounted or suppressed.

A distinguished citizen of Florida, who came to our State in 1871 and formerly held a prominent position in the Republican party and filled successfully the office of postmaster at Jacksonville, one of the most responsible positions in the State, while his party had control of the national administration, is now editing a weekly paper at Eustis, one of our flourishing towns, settled very largely by people from the North. A few months ago he received a letter from a former Northern friend who had accepted as true the oft-repeated stories of force and fraud in Southern elections and blamed him for upholding such practices. Mr. Hamilton Jay, the gentleman I refer to, in replying to the letter sets forth his opportunities for gaining correct information as to the condition of affairs in Florida and gives a fair statement of the record of our people on this question, and I submit his reply as published in his paper, hoping that, as it comes from a former Republican, it will receive attention among the old party associates of Mr. Jay, who will perhaps give it greater credit than if it came from one who was identified with the South prior to and during the late war. At this point I ask the Secretary to read what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEMOCRATIC FRAUD.

A valued correspondent at the West, in renewing his subscription to the Lake Region has this to say: "I like your paper with the exception of upholding Democratic fraud in the South."

I propose to drop the editorial "we" and answer this letter personally. I am a Northern man by birth and education, and came to Florida in 1871. For nearly ten years I was prominently identified with the Republican party in Florida both in a journalistic and official capacity. In the national election of 1876 I had charge of the United States soldiers at the polls in Jefferson County, and during the work of the returning board at Tallahassee I was editor of the Daily Union, a stalwart Republican newspaper, then published at Jacksonville. In April, 1877, I was appointed postmaster of Jacksonville.

In 1880 I became profoundly convinced that the Republican party as then constituted (and it is now composed of the same elements) was not the party to which the interests of the State could be properly committed. It was ignorant, rapacious, and unpatriotic, based entirely on the spoils doctrine, and utterly lacking in the nobler principles of political honor. For holding those opinions and refusing to sacrifice my self-respect at the demand of party leaders I was removed from office by the professional politician who masqueraded as President after the death of Garfield at the instance of another professional politician who was then misrepresenting Florida in the United States Congress. I was removed against the protest of ninety business houses of Jacksonville.

I state these facts not from any spirit of vain-gloriousness, but simply to show that I am fully competent to speak upon the subject alluded to by my correspondent. Of course I only speak for Florida, and I state most solemnly and truthfully that I have never seen a negro intimidated by a Southern white man in his exercise of the election franchise. On the contrary, I have on more than one occasion seen Southern white Democrats go with negroes who hesitated to approach the polls, and stand by their side while they voted the ticket they desired to vote, the Republican ticket.

In Florida every man votes as he chooses, without let or hinderance. Most of them vote Democratic, because they find under a Democratic government honesty, intelligence, and a wise and patriotic administration of affairs.

The patience and forbearance of the Southern white people during the trying times from 1868 to 1876 can not be too highly commended. I have known two cases of "Southern fraud" to be tried in the United States courts in Florida. In one, "Yellow Bluff," Republicans were tried and acquitted; the other, "Brevard County," where the Democratic candidate for Congress was acquitted, and the Republican county clerk was convicted. In both cases the courts were entirely in the hands of Republican officials.

The Eustis Lake Region will never uphold "Southern fraud" or any other fraud while I have editorial management of it, nor will it ever fail to render equal and exact justice to every man, white or black, Democrat or Republican; nor will it hesitate for one moment to expose fraud and injustice wherever found, and no matter where it may hit.

I am no office-seeker, have no ax to grind, and only write this article because I feel it my bounden duty never to let an unjust attack upon my adopted State go forth unchallenged.

HAMILTON JAY.

Mr. PASCO. I add, too, a recent editorial from the Lake Region, Mr. Jay's newspaper, in which he gives a fair description of the political condition of the State since it came under Democratic control; and it states sound reasons why conservative people oppose a return of the Republican party to power in this as well as the other misgoverned States of the South. And I allege, without fear of successful contradiction, that the bad record of the past, and not the suppression or fraudulent alteration of votes, is the insurmountable barrier which stands in the way of the so-called Republican party of the South and prevents its return to power.

Here is the editorial:

Florida is a Democratic State, most emphatically so. It will remain Democratic so long as party lines are drawn as close as now. All talk of carrying it for the Republican ticket in the coming State contest is sheer nonsense. It can not be done. The Northern element recently citizenized in this State adds largely to the Democratic majority on State and local issues. Republicans from every State in the Union settling in Florida find themselves confronted with a problem that can have but one solution. The Republican party of the North is only in name the Republican party of the South. Its elements vary as widely as the poles. The national issue that divides them is the same. The State issue is entirely and radically different. The thousands of Republicans who have settled in Florida during the past fifteen years find that if they would be true to the vital principles of their own party they must on State and local issues cast their fortunes with the dominant party. To do otherwise is to stultify their own professions and make a mockery of their own creed.

Viewing with clear eyes and unclouded reason the progress of the State under Democratic rule, they find that it has been the most rapid of any State in the Union, and that this rule has been wise, beneficent, and just. The administration of George F. Drew, who was elected governor of Florida in 1876, by an outburst of patriotism that ignored party lines, was the first step in the long succession of prosperity, added to by the administrations of Bloxham and Perry, which has made Florida one of the model States of the Republic. Under Democratic rule Florida has more than doubled in population, has only a nominal State debt, low taxes, a splendid school system and almost perfect security to life and property. Its record for good is unsurpassed, its promise of the future is unapproachable.

So far as Florida is concerned in our local election, the only principle at stake is that of good government. This is patent to every thinking, patriotic citizen, and has given to the Democratic party in all local contests a splendid, loyal contingent from those who in national politics are Republican to the core, but who realize in local politics the interests of good government are best subserved by the dominance of Democracy.

Never before as now was good government so necessary to the continued progress and prosperity of the State. To retrograde would be fatal. Patriotism sees this and is prepared to meet the issue. Our own course is plain. In the coming contest the Lake Region will play no neutral part. Its course will be outspoken, fair, and patriotic. It will be the earnest champion of the principles of good government, and support such measures as are best to enhance the best interests of the State. With malice toward none and charity for all, pandering to no prejudice and ignoring no virtue, we shall candidly and fearlessly advocate that wise patriotism and conservative progress that has made Florida a marvel among the States. We can only judge the future by the past, and thus judging we must in common with a very large majority of our fellow-citizens believe that the continued ascendency of the Democratic party in Florida is essential to the best and truest interests of the State.

Perhaps it may not be out of place before I leave this branch of the subject to call the attention of Senators to charges made against the South in 1874 in many respects similar to the present. A clamor was raised against Louisiana, and acts of violence and intimidation to deprive citizens of the freedom of the ballot because of their political opinions were alleged against her Democratic people. It was charged that a like condition of affairs existed in other Southern States. It was in the days when the bayonet was regarded as a legitimate addition to ordinary constitutional methods of government, and a Republican minority was being maintained in power in Louisiana by the persuasive influences of the United States Army. To use the mild language of those times, the Kellogg government was "recognized" by the President.

The matter was laid before the Forty-third Congress, when it convened at its second session, in the President's message. It was considered of sufficient importance by the House for the appointment of a special committee of seven members, to whom this part of the message relating to the condition of the Southern States was referred. The committee made a partial report January 15, 1875, which, I understand, was unanimous, and I call attention to the following extracts from it (Forty-third Congress, second session, Report No. 101, pages 2, 5–8):

Without now referring to other instances, we are constrained to declare that the action of the returning board, on the whole, was arbitrary, unjust, and, in our opinion, illegal; and that this arbitrary, unjust, and illegal action alone prevented the return by the board of a majority of Conservative members of the lower house.

Upon the general subject of the state of affairs in the South, and as to whether the alleged wrongs to colored citizens for political offenses are real, or were asserted without due foundation, your committee took such proof as the opportunity offered.

* * * * * * *

As a whole, they are constrained to say that the intention charged is not borne out by the facts before us. No general intimidation of Republican voters was established; no colored man was produced who had been threatened or assaulted by any Conservative because of political opinion, or discharged from employment or refused employment. Of all those who testified to intimidation there was hardly any one who of his own knowledge could specify a reliable instance of such acts, and of the white men who were produced to testify generally on such subjects, very nearly all, if not every single one, was the holder of an office. Throughout the rural districts of the State the number of white Republicans are very few; it hardly extends beyond those holding office and those connected with them. No witness, we believe, succeeded in naming, in any parish, five Republicans who supported the Kellogg government who were not themselves office-holders or related to office-holders or those having official employment.

* * * * * * *

On the other hand, it was in evidence that blacks who sought to act with the Conservative party were on their part sometimes exposed to enmity and abuse In the interior one colored man was shot for making a Conservative speech, and in New Orleans it appeared from the testimony that colored men who sought to co-operate with the Conservatives were subject to so much abuse from the police and otherwise that an association of lawyers volunteered to protect them, but with little effect.

The general condition of affairs in the State of Louisiana seems to be as follows: The conviction has been general among the whites since 1872 that the Kellogg government was an usurpation. This conviction among them has been strengthened by the acts of the Kellogg Legislature abolishing existing courts and judges and substituting others presided over by judges appointed by Kellogg, having extraordinary and exclusive jurisdiction over political questions; by changes in the laws centralizing in the governor every form of political control, including the supervision of the elections; by continuing the returning board, with absolute power over the returns of elections; by the extraordinary provisions enacted for the trial of titles and claims to office; by the conversion of the police force, maintained at the expense of the city of New Orleans, into an armed brigade of State militia subject to the command of the governor; by the creation in some places of monopolies in markets, gas-making, water-works, and ferries, cleaning vaults and removing filth, and doing work as wharfingers; by the abolition of courts with elective judges and the substitution of other courts with judges appointed by Kellogg, in evasion of the constitution of the State; by enactments punishing criminally all persons who attempted to fill official positions unless returned by the returning board; by unlimited appropriations for the payment of militia expenses and for the payment of legislative warrants, vouchers, and checks, issued during the years 1870 and 1872; by laws declaring that no persons in arrears for taxes after default published shall bring any suit in any court of the State or be allowed to be a witness in his own behalf—measures which, when coupled with the extraordinary burdens of taxation, have served to vest, in the language of Governor Kellogg's counsel, "a degree of power in the governor of a State scarcely exercised by any sovereign in the world."

With this conviction is a general want of confidence in the integrity of the existing State and local officials—a want of confidence equally in their purposes and in their personnel—which is accompanied by the paralyzation of business and destruction of values. The most hopeful witness produced by the Kellogg party, while he declared that business was in a sounder condition than ever before, because there was less credit, has since declared that "there was no prosperity." The securities of the State have fallen in two years from 70 or 80 to 25; of the city of New Orleans, from 80 or 90 to 30 or 40, while the fall in bank shares, railway shares, city, and other corporate companies have in a degree corresponded. Throughout the rural districts of the State the negroes, reared in habits of reliance upon their masters for support and in a community in which the members are always ready to divide the necessaries of life with each other, not regarding such action as very evil, and having immunity from punishment from the nature of the local officials, had come to filching and stealing fruit, vegetables, and poultry, so generally—as Bishop Wilmarth stated without contradiction from any source—that the raising of these articles had to be entirely abandoned, to the great distress of the white people, while within the parishes, as well as in New Orleans, the taxation had been carried almost literally to the extent of confiscation. In New Orleans the assessors are paid a commission for the amount assessed, and houses and stores are to be had there for the taxes. In Natchitoches the taxation reached about 8 per cent. of the assessed value on the property. In many parishes all the white Republicans and all the office-holders belong to a single family. There are five of the Greens in office in Lincoln; there are seven of the Boults in office in Natchitoches. As the people saw taxation increase and prosperity diminish—as they grew poor while officials grew rich—they became naturally sore. That they love their rulers can not be pretended.

* * * * * * *

But the reduction of wages, the non-fulfillment of personal or political pledges, the misfeasance of some local officials, disputes among the leading colored persons in other localities, the loss or embezzlement in some cases of the school funds, and the failure of the Freedman's Bank, all combined to divide the views of colored voters during the late campaign. An effort was accordingly made by the conservatives to acquire a part of the negro vote; with that view it was sought in many quarters to propitiate them. Frequent arrests by the United States marshals for intimidation or threats of non-employment, and the apprehension that was felt that the returning board would count out their men if excuse for such a course were offered, all combined, especially after the 14th of September, to put the conservatives on their good behavior, and the result was that in November, 1874, the people of the State of Louisiana did fairly have a free, peaceable, and full registration and election, in which a clear conservative majority was elected to the lower house of the Legislature, of which majority the conservatives were deprived by the unjust, illegal, and arbitrary action of the returning board.

This is from the special report made by Mr. HOAR from the select committee on that portion of the President's message in regard to the condition of the South in the Forty-third Congress, signed by Charles Foster, WILLIAM WALTER PHELPS, and Clarkson N. Potter, who constituted a subcommittee, but adopted as the report of the entire committee, of which the present Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] was chairman.

It appears from this report, made by a committee a majority of whom were Republicans, that the election investigated, which was for members of the Legislature, had been carried by the Democrats in 1874, and that the charges as to intimidation, violence, and fraud were not sustained against them, but that some of these wrongs had been practiced by their accusers. It further appeared that the Democrats lost the fruits of their election by the counting-out process successfully practiced by the famous returning board of that unfortunate State. The report further shows that the Democratic majority, relying upon the popular majorities that they had received, met and organized the lower house of the Legislature and were then driven out from their seats by a detachment of United States soldiers.

The committee submitted its final report February 23, 1875, and the resolutions, in which the entire committee united, are as follows (Forty-third Congress, second session, Report No. 261, page 5):

Whereas both branches of the Legislature of Louisiana have requested the special committee of this House to investigate the circumstances attending the election and returns thereof in that State for the year 1874; and

Whereas said committee have unanimously reported that the returning board of that State, in canvassing and compiling said returns and promulgating the result, wrongfully applied an erroneous rule of law, by reason whereof persons were awarded seats in the house of representatives of Louisiana to which they were not entitled and persons entitled to seats were deprived of them:

Resolved, That it is recommended to the house of representatives of Louisiana to take immediate steps to remedy said injustice and to place the persons rightfully entitled in their seats.

Resolved, That William Pitt Kellogg be recognized as the governor of the State of Louisiana until the end of the term of office fixed by the constitution of that State.

The preamble and the first resolution fully sustain the charge against the returning board of counting out Democrats who were duly elected to the State Legislature. The second resolution recommends that Kellogg, who had been counted in as governor after the election of 1872, be allowed to fill out his term undisturbed. It will be seen from the majority report that this was the result of a compromise; that the majority of the committee, composed of Messrs. Charles Foster of Ohio, WILLIAM WALTER PHELPS of New Jersey, Clarkson N. Potter of New York, and Samuel Marshall of Illinois, did not believe that he had ever been elected, but two of them, Messrs. Foster and PHELPS, deemed it best to avoid the mischief and confusion of a change, and therefore united with the other Republican members in the second resolution. I quote freely from this majority report, and it ought to have weight from the high standing of the Representatives who united in it and the fact that they were equally divided politically, so that it may be regarded as non-partisan.

Third. Eighteen hundred and seventy-four was a year of political change, in which the vote throughout all the States was seriously affected against the Republican party; a change resulting largely from the financial distress of the people, and which should therefore naturally have been even greater in Louisiana than elsewhere.

Fourth. It became the interest of the Conservatives, at least at the late election, not to intimidate but to acquire by every fair means the colored vote.

Parties who were alleged to have threatened blacks even with refusal of employment were subject to prompt arrest. It was known that pretexts would be sought to deprive the Conservatives of the result if they prevailed in the election. It was therefore their interest to avoid giving any such pretexts. Accordingly, they determined everywhere to co-operate with and conciliate the blacks. They voted down the propositions or suggestions which were made in the early part of the campaign for the refusal to employ those colored voters who would not co-operate with them, and generally sought, by combining with colored voters, to carry the election.

Local combinations against the Kellogg candidates were made in many parishes by men of all parties and colors. In several parishes a union ticket of colored conservative votes was voted for and elected. An intelligent colored witness testified that he "desired better government," and to that end "was willing to swallow the white men if the white men would swallow the colored." These causes and feelings naturally united to swell the conservative vote in such localities exactly as indicated by the returns.

Fifth. The entire want of any direct evidence to show any general intimidation of the colored voters.

Of course, in so large a State, it would be impossible there should be no instances of refusal to employ nor of intimidation. Such occur in every State. But the evidence certainly indicates no general intimidation of colored voters, and that such intimidation as did exist in the State was rather in the interest of the Republicans than of the conservatives. The United States marshals, whose chief was chairman of the Republican State committee, armed in some cases by blank warrants, and aided by Federal troops, made constant arrests before election, but not afterward. The oversight of the elections and of the returns was in the hands of Governor Kellogg's officials. Their count and return did show 29 majority of members of the lower house elected by the conservatives without any protest whatever, except in three parishes, although it was their province and duty to protest in any case where violence, or intimidation, or fraud existed.

Indeed, the direct evidence as to the election of 1874, as well as the circumstances, clearly indicate a peaceable and fair election. In fact, after the visit of the first committee and the revisit of the special committee, the Kellogg party, with all their machinery for collecting evidence, were unable to produce in the entire State more than half a dozen persons to testify to anything impeaching the freedom and fairness of the late elections who were not office-holders or connected with office-holders.

Against such facts it seems to us idle to assume that the disturbances so vividly pictured by the minority could have kept up throughout this State such a feeling of intimidation as would justify the assumption that but for that feeling the State would have gone Republican. All experience shows that the result of the election of 1874 in Louisiana, as returned to the returning board, was natural, and to be only accounted for by the reasons we have given.

We hold, therefore, that in November, 1874, the people of the State of Louisiana did fairly have a free, peaceable, and full registration and election, in which a clear Conservative majority was elected to the lower house of the Legislature, of which majority the Conservatives were deprived by the unjust, illegal, and arbitrary action of the returning board.

To the resolution reported to the House from the committee, as to the action of the returning board, we are all agreed.

We understand the committee to be unanimous in finding the fact that the action of the returning board has defeated the will of the people as expressed by them at the polls on the 3d of November, 1874. The people then elected to the lower house of their Legislature a majority of Conservative members; a portion of the Conservative members thus elected were refused their certificates. This is an act of great injustice to the individuals, of gravest danger to the State and free government, and ought to be immediately corrected by any power competent to correct it.

The resolution recommending the recognition of Governor Kellogg is based upon general information and not upon evidence. On this point no testimony was taken, either by the committee or any part of it. Kellogg may or not have been elected in 1872, but there is no evidence to show the fact, or, if there be, it has been neither sought nor found by this committee. Messrs. Foster and Phelps think that the popular belief, taking both conservative and radical circles, inclines on the whole to justify Kellogg and Penn's claims; and that, as Kellogg is and has been the acting governor of Louisiana for the past two years, to deny his right and install another in his place, after this lapse of time, might involve much mischief to the legal and political interests of the State.

To avoid the mischief and confusion of change, a majority of the citizens of Louisiana seem willing to accept as a compromise Kellogg's recognition and the restoration to the Conservatives of the control of the lower house.

For these reasons Messrs. Foster and PHELPS do not wish to oppose the recommendation that the administration of Governor Kellogg be recognized; neither, in view of the fact that they know nothing of the merits of the case as judged by competent evidence, do they wish to be understood as urging it. They only wish to record their agreement with those of their associates who believe that such a compromise might, by making a termination of the uncertainty in Louisiana, be on the whole less intolerable than the present distress.

But to any resolution recognizing Kellogg Messrs. Potter and Marshall are utterly opposed. They find nothing to justify the belief that Kellogg was elected. That he seized the government by the aid of Federal troops, through a void and fraudulent order which prevented the counting and return of the votes, should be a standing presumption against him.

When the people, outraged by the abuses of his government, had successfully regained the office he had usurped, he was again reseated by Federal power. By the forms of legislation with which he had intrenched himself, he once more sought to nullify the choice of the people at the late election, and to that end called on the Federal troops to break up the meeting of a Legislature.

For Congress to recognize usurpation so gross and so oppressive is, they think, to establish a precedent by which, under pretexts that can readily be found, any State government may be overthrown, the will of the people nullified, fraud and violence made permanent, and republican forms perverted to destroy liberty.

In their judgment all that is needed in Louisiana is to withdraw the Federal troops and leave the people of that State to govern themselves.

CHARLES FOSTER.
WILLIAM WALTER PHELPS.
CLARKSON N. POTTER.
SAMUEL MARSHALL.

All admitted that Louisiana had been shamefully misgoverned by the Republicans; that there had been wrong and corruption in State and local administration, especially under Warmoth's rule, and that the Republicans had continued their power by wrongful means.

The minority report, signed by Representatives GEORGE F. HOAR, W. A. Wheeler, and W. P. FRYE, differed mainly from the majority in blaming the Democratic people for the means which, according to the findings of the minority, they had used to put down bad government and usurpation.

With such a result from a committee appointed by Speaker Blaine, composed of five Republicans and only two Democrats, to investigate charges preferred by a Republican President, can the Senator from New Hampshire reasonably expect a different result by sustaining the charges now made before an investigation committee? Is it not prima facie probable that his charges have no better foundation than those which were so unjustly made in 1874?

Louisiana has patiently endured fresh wrongs since that day by the usurpation of 1876. And it would have been indeed strange if her people had not arisen in 1878 without regard to race, without regard to former political associations, without regard to color, without reference to an approaching national election, and overwhelmed with their ballots the Republican candidate for governor, Mr. Warmoth, who had impudently offered his name for the support of a wronged and outraged people, when his former administration had been declared dishonest and corrupt by such high Republican authority as acted upon that committee.

I take pleasure in reciting here a statement from a well-known Republican newspaper published in Western Massachusetts, the Springfield Republican, which takes the position that Warmoth virtually gave up the battle on the eve of the election, and suggests a motive for it which is in harmony with the tactics of Southern Republicans in former contests.

It is as follows:

[Springfield, Mass., Republican, August 23.]

Senator CHANDLER delivered yesterday his speech upon the motion to inquire into the Louisiana election of April last. As to the merits of the particular motion, little need be said. He may have evidence of fraud in the spring elections, although he did not produce it. The argument by comparing the returns of previous elections will not do, because based upon the supposition that every negro is a Republican. Ex-Governor Warmoth, who was the Republicrn candidate for governor of Louisiana, presented Senator CHANDLER'S argument to him three weeks before the elections. Up to that time he had led a good party fight. Suddenly he published a letter claiming that some kind of a deal had been made by which Governor Nicholls was to be counted in. He said that it was useless for him to contend against such odds. This was a direct invitation to his followers to refrain from voting. Hundreds of negroes voted for Nicholls, and they repeated the service at New Orleans a few weeks later, thus securing some of the offices at the hands of the Democrats. Warmoth's surrender upon the eve of battle astonished the Democrats, but there was method in his madness. The returns enrich Mr. CHANDLER'S speech and give him a chance to make out a case upon paper. He succeeded in precipitating a series of personalities yesterday, and so far he was successful. The situation in the South has improved so wonderfully that it is sad to see this friend and advocate of the bloody shirt attempt to turn back the pages of history for partisan purposes.

It is not often that such an opportunity is afforded to call the attention of the country to the fact that there are Northern Republicans who not only understand the situation at the South but are willing to do justice to our section and to recognize the fact that our elections are influenced and controlled there by like causes that control and influence elections in other sections of the country.

When such utterances as this from the Springfield Republican are more frequent and the people of the North rebuke the politicians who are always trying to array one section against another for purely partisan purposes, we shall have made a great advance in dealing with this race question in politics.

As I stated in the progress of my remarks, the Republican party of the South has left behind it a bad record in this matter of honest elections, and during the time that they held control of the governments of the Southern States and maintained their ascendency by any means that would win, right or wrong, they were generally sustained by their Northern allies. When damaging proof was brought forward of a nature to shock the moral sentiment of the country, legal difficulties to its consideration were interposed and no serious check was ever given to the successful consummation of Republican election fraud or wrong in any of the Southern States. Nothing has occurred of late years to show any real change of heart in the Republican party on this subject, and we have no reason to believe that if power was restored to them and the same opportunities were again offered, they would make a better and more honest record than they did prior to 1877.

In selecting the instance that I promised to give of an election carried in the South by unlawful and irregular means and practices, I have chosen the Florida election of 1876, upon which I have for some time wished to address the Senate.

In a speech made by the Senator from Ohio on April 18, when the bill for the admission of Dakota was before the Senate, he took occasion to refer to the Presidential election of 1876 and denounced those who believe and allege that Mr. Hayes was not elected to the Presidency in the following language (RECORD, page 3241):

And hereafter when any man shall assert of President Hayes that he was elected by fraud or wrong, or that he was not duly elected, I will hold him in contempt as uttering that which is not true.

And again—

That he was fairly elected, honorably elected, I believe no man can question.

This language filled me with surprise, for I thought that the popular mind had long since become convinced that Mr. Tilden and not Mr. Hayes was really entitled to the majority of the electoral votes in that famous contest.

The subject of the debate then had was the vote of Louisiana. I have no other information as to that State than that which is open and accessible to the general reader, and shall leave the discussion of it to those who are familiar with all the details and can speak of them with greater accuracy than I can. But I have no hesitancy in saying that my own investigations, made with a sincere desire to discover the truth, have led me to a very positive conclusion as to the result in Louisiana, and that is that the State was fairly carried by the Democratic party and that Tilden was justly entitled to its electoral vote in 1876.

I believe I am sustained in this view by the published statements of the Senator from New Hampshire whose resolution is now under discussion, and as he played a large part in the management of the Republican side of the electoral contests in the disputed Southern States in that memorable year, his statements against his party friends ought to have great weight.

In 1877 and 1878, while the incidents of the struggle were fresh in his mind, he published some letters in the newspapers upon the election of 1876 and its results which were afterwards collected into a pamphlet. In this pamphlet, on pages 9 and 10, he admits that Tilden received 7,000 more votes than Hayes in Louisiana; he admits that more than 7,000 of these votes were thrown out, not on account of any wrongdoing which had been proved and established, but simply on account of alleged murder, riot, and intimidation. He expresses doubts as to its being justifiable and says that it required courage and assurances that the national exigency demanded its performance and the moral support of the North. He further says that the returning board performed this extraordinary work after receiving such assurances. I quote his language, that I may not do him injustice:

In Louisiana, however, there had been thrown into the ballot-boxes over 7,000 more votes for the Tilden than for the Hayes electors, and to make Hayes President it became necessary for the returning board, acting under peculiar local laws, to throw out more than 7,000 Tilden votes on account of alleged murder, riot, and intimidation, preventing a fair and free election in certain parishes. To perform this extraordinary, even if justifiable, work in the face of an armed and infuriated Democracy required men of undaunted courage, and such courage the returning board possessed. It required also that the board should have assurances that the national exigency demanded its performance, that the moral sentiment of the North would approve it, and that they themselves should be protected from evil consequences to be apprehended from the violence of a mob government, which it was known would be established by one Nicholls, a pretender to the office of governor against Stephen B. Packard, who was sure to be found to be elected governor if the Hayes electors should be found to have been chosen.

All these assurances were freely and forcibly given by Mr. Senator SHERMAN and his associates.

His subsequent language in referring to the way in which Mr. Hayes reached the Presidential office is, very frequently, not that he was elected to it by the people, but that he was "counted in;" and on page 24 he insinuates, if he does not directly charge, that this counting in was the result of a bargain by which Mr. Hayes was to become President upon abandoning the Packard State government.

In a letter written to him by William Lloyd Garrison, which is published in this same pamphlet, it is distinctly admitted that the election of Mr. Hayes was carried in South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida by "bayonet rule," and the publisher of the pamphlet especially commends "the clear vision and calm judgment" of Mr. Garrison.

If, however, the result had depended upon the vote of Louisiana only, I should have remained silent. But the vote of Louisiana, added to the States which actually gave Republican majorities, was not enough to elect Mr. Hayes. Four more were required, and, notwithstanding the risk of incurring the contempt of the Senator from Ohio, I allege and charge that these were wrongfully taken from the State which I have the honor in part to represent in order to make the requisite number of votes to give Mr. Hayes an apparent majority of 1. At the former discussion the debate was extended to so late an hour that I was unwilling to detain the Senate with a full history of the circumstances that led to that result, but did not wish my silence to be regarded as an admission that Mr. Hayes was entitled to the vote of Florida. So I contented myself with a promise to go at length into the matter at a future day, which promise I now propose to redeem.

Since that time another distinguished Senator upon the other side, the Senator from Kansas, has reiterated the claim that Mr. Hayes was fairly elected to the Presidency in 1876, and in a speech made here on May 1 he uses the following remarkable language (RECORD, page 3994):

I feel bound to say that his title is the most absolutely impregnable of any in the whole line of American Presidents, because it is the only one ever passed upon by a constitutional tribunal lawfully organized for that purpose.

As well might one claim to be superior to his neighbors in honesty because he had been tried for crime and acquitted, while their integrity had never been questioned. But if the accused had been acquitted because of a want of jurisdiction in the tribunal to hear the case and listen to the witnesses, his claim to superior honesty would certainly be denied.

On the morning of Wednesday, November 8, 1876, as the returns of the election which had taken place the day previous became known to the people, it became apparent that Mr. Tilden was elected.

Subsequent history establishes it as a fact that the aggregation of the figures, which were publicly announced at the voting-places and precincts all over the United States on the evening of the election, demonstrated a majority for him both in the popular and the electoral vote.

Leading newspapers that received and published the returns in the large cities of the country announced Mr. Tilden's election on the morning after the contest. Mr. Hayes admitted his defeat, and an interview with him, held the day after the election, was published in the leading newspapers of the country. He said:

I think we are defeated in spite of the recent good news. I am of the opinion that the Democrats have carried the country and elected Tilden.

* * * * * * *

I do not care for myself, for the party, yes, and the country, too, can stand it, but I do care for the poor colored men of the South.

But the Republicans were not willing to accept the verdict of the people and relinquish their power. Without waiting for any attack upon the result, they promptly sent out agents and "visiting statesmen" to certain States whose votes they needed to make up the 185 which were necessary for a choice. One of the States thus marked out was Florida. I had the honor to serve as chairman of the Democratic State executive committee during the campaign and was familiar with the events that occurred and of the circumstances that subsequently attended the count. There was no more reason why a doubt should have been cast upon the result in Florida than in Rhode Island or New Jersey. It was always capable of ascertainment by those who desired the truth in an orderly way, without the aid of visiting statesmen or returning boards, without the presence of bayonets or artillery.

On the morning after the election Mr. Martin, who was the chairman of the Republican State committee of Florida, sent a telegram, which was published in the New York Herald, saying:

No more peaceable or quiet election was ever held in any State.

The doubts did not come from Florida; the excuse for pursuing unusual measures did not originate there. They came and originated from beyond the State. Florida at the time had a Republican governor, and every executive and judicial officer throughout the State and in every county was a Republican appointee. The election law was framed by a Republican Legislature, and was cunningly devised to give every possible advantage to the party in power. The whole machinery of the election was in the hands of the Republican office-holders and their appointees.

The governor had the appointment of the county commissioners in every county. The county commissioners designated the voting places in their respective counties, controlled the registration books and lists, and appointed the inspectors of election in every precinct. The clerk, county judge, sheriff, and justices of the peace, appointed in each county by the Republican governor, were the officers, three of whom composed the county canvassers, whose duty it was to compile the returns from the precincts and send the results of the county canvass to the governor and secretary of state. Finally, the State canvassers were cabinet officers, the secretary of state, the comptroller, and the attorney-general, all appointees of a Republican governor, all of whom had voted for Grant for President four years before, though the last named voted for Tilden in 1876.

The law required the returns to be transmitted through the mails, and it is well known that the railway mail service and the post-offices were all controlled by a national administration Republican from center to circumference. In addition to this Tallahassee was a Republican city, in a strong Republican county; in a section which was in the habit of giving large Republican majorities. The county it was in and the two nearest it on the line of railroad gave in the aggregate in the election of 1876, 6,995 Republican votes and 2,575 Democratic votes. And besides, the system of railroad which extended from the Chattahoochee to the St. Johns and from Fernandina to Cedar Keys had been seized by the State and was under the management of one of the Republican cabinet officers.

It can readily be seen which party had the advantage, and that the opportunities for wrong-doing of any kind were all with the Republicans.

We knew full well that they had these opportunities, and former experience had taught us that they knew how to avail themselves of them. Vigilance was all that was left to the Democrats.

Knowing the importance of ascertaining the actual result as it was announced at each precinct when the polls closed, the Democratic State committee arranged to be represented at every voting place in the State on the evening of the election, and their representatives were furnished with blanks similar in all respects to those in the hands of the election officers, and upon these blanks the actual result was entered. Wherever the officers were willing to do so they signed these duplicate returns, and when they refused the fact was noted and the returns were sent forward to the State committee without the signatures of the officers. This was an effectual check upon subsequent alteration, and in but one case was it attempted, and in the few cases where precincts were omitted from county returns there was no difficulty in establishing such omission, nor in telling the true result.

This result, as to the electoral vote, taking for comparison the highest vote for elector on each ticket, was as follows:

Tilden electors	24,469
Hayes electors	24,137
Tilden majority	332

The difference between the votes for electors was small, being 6 on the Republican ticket and 3 on the Democratic.

The Democratic majorities on the State ticket were about 500 greater.

There were but two changes in these results between the precinct and county canvass.

In Clay County one precinct was not included in the total number of votes. It was omitted because there was no signature to the jurat of the oath of the inspectors. The vote of this precinct was, however, given upon the return, and was as follows:

Tilden electors	29
Hayes electors	6

It was subsequently proved before the State canvassing board that the inspectors were in fact sworn, and the election at this precinct was never impeached, nor was any attempt made to impeach it.

In Alachua County a bold and successful fraud was perpetrated at a precinct known as Archer No. 2, by which 219 votes were added to the Republican figures after the public announcement of the result at the polls on the evening of the election.

The vote as announced was—

Republican	180
Democratic	136
Total	316

The vote as canvassed was—

Hayes electors	399
Tilden electors	136
Total	535

Three reputable citizens swear to the above public and official announcement.

Samuel T. Fleming, a well-known citizen, of good character, of the same county, also swears that he was present all day long, from the opening to the closing of the polls, and took down the names of all the voters who voted from the outside, and that there were 305 who so voted, and besides there were about 15 inside of the room who voted, but whose names he did not take down.

Two of the three inspectors have sworn that the smaller of the above votes was the true result.

It appears that after the public announcement of the vote the returns were signed in blank, leaving the number of votes to be inserted later, and one of the Republican inspectors, Richard H. Black, and the Republican clerk of the election, Thomas H. Vance, took charge of the return, poll-book, ballot-box, etc., and went to Gainesville, the county site. Soon after midnight they arrived at the house of L. G. Dennis, one of the leading spirits among the Florida Republicans, popularly known as "the little giant," then a candidate upon the legislative ticket.

There seems to have been some disappointment as to the number of the Republican votes from the precinct, and upon the complaint of Dennis, Black and Vance agreed to add something over 200 votes to the Republican side. So in his presence they took the county registration list and deliberately copied from it the requisite number of names to the poll-book andadded the corresponding number of votes to those given to the Republican candidates, and thus filled in the blank returns.

All the details of this crime were not disclosed at the State canvass, but it was clearly proved, and was a matter of public notoriety at Tallahassee; and at a later date, when the Potter committee was organized, Dennis was summoned to attend as a witness, and on oath told how the whole affair was managed.

His testimony appears in the report of the Potter committee (volume 1, pages 494 and 495). His own account of this transaction is given in a published statement, to which he refers in his testimony, which reads as follows:

L. G. DENNIS UNDER A STATEMENT.

The following is a statement made by L. G. Dennis about the fraud in Alachua County. It will be supplemented by a more detailed statement:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., March 22, 1878.

"I have resided in Alachua County, Florida, since January, 1866, and was elected to the State Assembly in 1876, at the same time of the late Presidential election. I was at that time a member of the State central committee of the Republican party of Florida, and also chairman of the Republican committee of Alachua County. I was also president of the board of county commissioners of Alachua County from 1873 to 1877, and was familiar with the manner of registration and manner of voting, the location of the polls, and all other election machinery. As president of said board, and with the consent of said board, I located all the polling-places, appointed all the inspectors who conducted the election, received and counted the ballots, and made and certified to the returns. I appointed as inspectors of Archer precinct, box No. 2, Green R. Moore, Floyd Duke, and Richard H. Black. Thomas D. Vance went at my request to Archer precinct on the day previous to the election, and was appointed by the inspectors clerk of the election at box No. 2, and served as such. I was at Gainesville on the day of the election, and on that night and the day following my residence was the headquarters of the Republican party, and during the night preceding the election all information was brought to me there.

"Some time after midnight of that night Inspector Black came to my house and reported to me that the result of the election at box No. 2 for Presidential electors was as follows: For the Hayes electors 180, for the Tilden electors 136.

A little later Mr. Vance, the clerk at said box No. 2, came and made the same report. Subsequently both Black and Vance came to me and said they had the returns from Archer precinct, box No. 2, signed in blank by the inspectors, and that they would make out the returns so as to meet the expectations of their own party. They retired to a private room, where they remained two or three hours, and then informed me that they had added about 200 names to the poll-list as having voted and had increased the Republican vote to that extent, and I afterwards learned that they had added 219 names to the poll-list.

"I entered the room while they were employed there, and saw them copying names from the county registration list upon which those who had actually voted at Archer precinct, box No. 2, were checked off, and the new names were selected from the names of Republican voters who had not already voted at that precinct. After completing the returns in this manner they filed them with the ballot-box with the county clerk.

"The county commissioners met a few days after election, the board consisting of I. E. Webster, clerk of the court; W. H. Belton, justice of the peace; and Louis A. Barnes, the sheriff, all of whom were Republicans. During the canvass Inspector Moore appeared before the board and submitted an affidavit to the effect that the returns from Archer precinct No. 2 were false, and that the true returns should be for the Hayes electors 180 votes, and the Tilden electors 136 votes, but the board decided they could not hear evidence as to the truth or falsity of the returns, and upon the face of the returns the vote of the county was as follows: For the Hayes electors, 1,984; for the Tilden electors, 1,267; the result included the 219 votes for the Hayes electors which were added to the vote cast at Archer precinct, box No. 2, by Black and Vance. These returns were sent to the governor and secretary of state. After these returns were filed with the secretary of state an effort was made to invalidate them so far as Archer precinct, box No. 2, was concerned. Affidavits signed by Floyd Dukes and Greene R. Moore, and an official statement from Mr. Webster, clerk, were filed with the State canvassing board, for the purpose of showing that the returns from Archer precinct, box No. 2, were false and fraudulent. It also appeared that Mr. Belton, the justice of the peace, had not signed the return filed with the secretary of state and governor. One of the duplicate returns was sent back to Alachua County, and Belton's signature was obtained. Moore also was induced to make a counter-affidavit denying the truth of his former affidavit. A counter-affidavit was also obtained from Floyd Dukes, denying his former affidavit.

"The grand jury of Alachua County investigated the Archer precinct matter, but failed to find any fraud, and passed a resolution to that effect. Whereupon Mr. Webster was induced to withdraw his statement and make another to the effect that he was satisfied that the return was all right. Then affidavits and statements were laid before the State canvassing board, and the returns were counted. This result gave the Hayes electors 219 more votes than were cast for them.

"I have never heretofore made any written statement or given any evidence regarding this election in Alachua County.

"L. G. DENNIS."

The above was sworn to in Florida before a justice of the peace, and is certified by the secretary of state.

But this fraud was carried into the county return and it entered into the general result, and Mr. Hayes received the full benefit of it in all the final statements, whether Democratic or Republican.

And to give some idea of the condition of society there at that time and the facilities in the hands of our political opponents, I may as well state here that after taking these names, as Black and Vance did, according to the sworn testimony of Dennis, at random from the registration list, the Republican managers went out into the highways and byways and brought in men who readily swore that they cast these surplus votes.

Deducting the vote of the Clay County precinct wrongfully omitted and adding the fruits of the Archer fraud to the Republican side gives the actual electoral vote as it reached the State capitol:

	Tilden.	Hayes.
Total vote as before	24,469	24,137
Deduct Clay County precinct	29	6
	24,440	24,131
Add Archer fraud		219
		24,350
Democratic majority		90

According to the law of the State as then clearly understood, and as afterwards declared by the supreme court, this was the actual electoral result, and it should have been promptly announced without endangering the peace and safety of the country.

This was the situation in Florida the day after the election. The returns showed a majority for the Tilden electors, notwithstanding they came from Republican officials, through Republican sources; notwithstanding the opportunities for fraud and their willingness to perpetrate it. The Tilden electors would probably have received the official proofs of their election but for events which were transpiring outside of the State. The Republican leaders found that they required more votes; a political necessity was urging them on, and the circumstances which I am about to relate, taken in connection with their subsequent acts, indicate a determination to secure a majority of the electoral votes and the inauguration of Mr. Hayes, whether he was elected by the people or not.

Three witnesses have sworn before committees of Congress appointed to investigate the election of 1876 and matters pertaining thereto that on the day after the election, the very day when, as I have already stated, the chairman of the Republican State committee had telegraphed that no more peaceable or quiet election was ever held in any State, telegrams were received from trusted leaders of the Republican party in the North stating that the salvation of the country depended upon the vote of Florida being cast for Hayes, and that money and troops would be forthcoming if necessary to secure this result. This was in advance of any call for aid, and in advance of any complaint of disturbance, and while Florida was peaceful and quiet as Vermont.

One of the witnesses, who was the regular telegraph operator at Tallahassee, says that one telegram from Tallahassee, in reply to the suggestion coming from Washington or New York that the returns must be attacked, inquired upon what grounds they should attack them, and the reply said, fraud, intimidation, and some other word which he did not remember. The money was sent, as Mr. McLin, the chief of the returning board, and others testified; the troops were ordered to the State capital, and the war upon the honest majorities was commenced.

Among the visiting statesmen who visited Florida to aid the Republicans in their efforts was the present junior Senator from New Hampshire; and it has since been alleged by Mr. McLin, the secretary of state and chairman of the board of State canvassers at the time, when he was under oath before the Potter committee as a witness, in June, 1878, that he was approached by Mr. Chandler during the canvass, who assured him that if the State went and was canvassed for Mr. Hayes the majority of the returning board would be well taken care of.

This has never been denied by this gentleman, although the opportunity was given to him by the committee and he was sworn as a witness and his attention was called to McLin's testimony on this very point, but he never met the charge with a square denial. And in the pamphlet to which I have already referred he says that the choice of Hayes electors in Florida "was declared without extraordinary assurances from the Northern visitors."

McLin was taken care of and was appointed associate justice of the supreme court of New Mexico, and nearly all of the other guilty agents, whether of high or low degree, who aided in the work of changing the vote of Florida received some Federal appointment, whether in recognition of the special services rendered or because of their superior fitness for the positions they were placed in we can judge for ourselves. And most of those who did not get official place and position were permanently soured against the Hayes administration, because they failed to get the "recognition" that it seems they were led to expect.

The next step in the conspiracy to count the vote of Florida for Hayes and Wheeler was to make the face of the returns show a majority in their favor. The Democratic county of Baker was selected, about whose vote there had been no doubt nor dispute. The county was in the northern part of the State, was traversed by a line of railroad, and the vote had been regularly and publicy canvassed by the county clerk and the only justice of the peace in the county directly after the election. The county judge should have joined with them, but he declined, and in his absence, the sheriff, who also declined, so the two remaining officers acted without them. But this was in accordance with precedent, and there was no controversy about the result. The precincts of the county, four in number, aggregated as follows:

Precincts.	Tilden electors.	Hayes electors.
Olustee	32
Sanderson	57	130
Johnsville	84
Darbyville	65	13
Total	238	143

The legal canvass was made by the clerk and Justice Dorman November 10, and on the 13th they made a second canvass with precisely the same results, and sent with the second return a statement that they had been obliged to discharge their duty as county canvassers without the aid of the county judge or the sheriff because of the refusal of each of those officials to act with them. The clerk left the court-house about 6 p. m. It was dark when he left there. He had been obliged to light a candle to finish his writing before leaving. He lived a few miles from town, and went on home. After he left the deputy clerk (Howell), who claimed an office afterwards as the originator of this scheme, furnished Driggers with the key to the clerk's office, and thus a fresh lot of canvassers gained admission and entered upon the scene.

Driggers, the county judge, had persuaded the sheriff to help him under the false pretense that it was necessary because of the clerk's absence, when in fact the clerk had been in town and at his post of duty all day. Up to the 11th of November, a few days after the election, Dorman, who had already assisted at the legal canvass, was the only justice of the peace in the county. On that day the governor, at Driggers's request, made to enable him to get up this false canvass, gave Driggers a commission appointing William Green as a justice of the peace, and Driggers looked him up and secured his aid. The three conspirators, under the cover of darkness, sought the court-house. They knew that the canvassing board had met, discharged their duty, and adjourned. Driggers had, in conversation with the clerk, announced himself as satisfied with the canvass already made. There were no spectators.

They took the precinct returns as the canvassers had left them. Driggers presided, and without any evidence before them, without seeking for any, they undertook to throw out the unchallenged returns from the two Democratic precincts of Johnsville and Darbyville, which gave 149 votes to the Tilden electors and 13 to the Hayes electors, and to include only the other two precincts in their pretended canvass.

They remained at the clerk's office but a short time and completed their work at the house of a neighbor.

The two precincts thus thrown out just reversed the result, and instead of 90 majority for Tilden it is 46 for Hayes, as the figures show:

	Tilden.	Hayes.
Former figures	24,440	24,350
Deduct the two Baker County precincts	149	13
	24,291	24,337

Hayes	24,337
Tilden	24,291
Majority for Hayes	46

All of these returns went forward to the capitol, and when the State canvassers presented the returns the secretary of state held back the true and honest return and brought forward the partial and fraudulent substitute as the only return received from the county. It was only after a determined effort that the chairman of the Democratic State committee succeeded in drawing from the secretary of state the return first received, which proved beyond all successful controversy that the papers upon their face showed that Tilden was entitled to the electoral vote of the State.

So thoroughly was this fraud exposed that the State canvassing board refused to give vitality to it and canvassed the county by including the returns from all the four precincts, and thus it was admitted that, so far as the returns are concerned, they show a Tilden majority, and they were as follows when arranged by counties:

I might safely stop here, for, as I will show later on, the Supreme Court finally decided that it was the duty of the State canvassers to count the returns, and that they had no right to change them or to reject them when regular on their face. But I prefer to call attention to the fact that the Republicans had everything to lose and nothing to gain by an investigation of the election, and I shall confine myself to the larger matters which were brought to the attention of the State canvassing board.

In Leon County, at a precinct known as Richardson's School-House, about 10 miles from the State capital, 73 "little jokers," as they were termed, were surreptitiously introduced into the box, probably before the election commenced. This "little joker" was a very small ballot with the names of the electoral, State, and county candidates of the Republican party printed upon it.

The circumstances attending this fraud were as follows: Bowes was the leading spirit. He was the County Superintendent of public instruction and the local editor of the Republican organ at Tallahassee. He sent word to Amos Rouse, who had been appointed as the Democratic inspector, who lived a few miles from the voting-place, that he would call at his house on the morning of the election, take an early breakfast with him, and go on together with him to the precinct at Richardson's School-House. Instead of doing so he took Lawrence R. Booth, Isaac Dent, and Wiley Jones, three colored men and Republicans with him the night before and they slept at the school-house. They were all non-residents of the district. Rouse delayed a little before going to the precinct on the morning of the election, waiting for Bowes, and at length rode on to the school-house and reached there before 8 o'clock, the time fixed by law for beginning the election. He found that Bowes had substituted Isaac Dent in his place and that the election was proceeding without a Democratic officer. He staid by the box all day, and swears that none of the "little jokers" were openly voted and that none appeared till the box was opened at night. The poll-book consisted of a lot of detached sheets; neither the names nor the pages were numbered. It was proved that two or three of the sheets contained names of men who voted at other precincts; many of them swore before the House committee that they had never been to Richardson's School-House in their lives.

These small ballots were printed at the office of the official newspaper of the State, the Republican organ, and for the very purpose of fraud, though there was no proof that they were used elsewhere.

Hayes received the full benefit of these 73 "little jokers," and as the face of the returns, even counting the false return from Baker County, only gave him a majority of 46, Bowes could claim that he made a President with these instrumentalities. He was indicted for his crime and fled to Washington, where he was provided for in the Treasury Department.

In Jefferson County there was a population of about 3,000 males over the age of twenty-one. This was ascertained by a State census taken the year before, and by a census of those old enough to vote taken by the party organization of the Democratic party during the campaign. They differed about 150, a fair increase of the population during the interval. Notwithstanding this the registration list contained about 4,350 names and 3,401 votes were cast and counted on the election day. A comparison of the registration list with the census showed that only 2,829 legal voters had actually registered. The excess was shown to be on the Republican side. If every person of the requisite age had been entitled to vote and had voted the excess was 572 (3,401—2,829) votes, which, however, is only the minimum of the fraudulent vote. Many had been convicted of crime or were from other causes disqualified from voting; some who had registered did not vote.

The excess was composed of convicted and unpardoned criminals, young men in their non-age, repeaters, persons who had not gained a residence of sufficient length to entitle them to a vote; and in one precinct the county judge, who was also a precinct canvasser and a Republican in good standing in his party, at a precinct 10 or 12 miles from his home, boasted that he had substituted and counted a package of 100 Republican votes which had not been cast by the voters for a similar package of 100 Democratic votes which had been cast by the voters.

These are the larger frauds which the Democratic managers established, and the difficulties in their way will be understood when I again state that all the machinery of the election and all the original records of it were in the hands of the Republican appointees. It will thus be seen that the Democratic majority of 90 was in spite of the following fraudulent votes and omissions:

Clay precinct, Democratic majority omitted	23
Archer precinct	219
Richardson's School-House	73
Jefferson, fraudulent Republican excess	572
	887

The State canvassing board decided, contrary to law, that they had the power to go behind the returns, and instead of doing so in the interest of right they passed by these manifest frauds in Alachua, Leon, and Jefferson. All that they did was to count the omitted precinct in Clay and deduct about 60 from the Republican majority in Jefferson. This was a mere straining out of the gnats.

They did, however, go back of some of the Democratic returns, and the following are the principal reductions, which I will review in order:

Counties.	Tilden.	Hayes.
Hamilton:
Jasper No. 2	323	185
White Springs	83	58
Jackson:
Friendship Church	145	44
Campbellton	291	77
Manatee	262	26
Monroe	401	59
Total	1,505	449

In Hamilton County two Democratic precincts were attempted to be thrown out by a majority of the State canvassing board, against the protest of the third member. At Jasper No. 2 the board continued its work until 4 the next morning, and the result was publicly announced. The night was cold; there was no fire in the court-house, where the election was held. The officers had been on duty for about twenty hours and were exhausted. They adjourned without objection till 9 a. m., when they reconvened, filled up, and signed the papers according to the result as announced the night before. The figures were unchallenged, and the irregularities complained of had no effect whatever upon the vote as cast and counted. The return was regular upon its face, and the attempt to exclude it was in violation of law, and the courts which passed upon this vote decided that it must be counted.

At White Springs the election was regular, fair, and unchallenged. But the blank form sent to the precinct was defective; there was no place in it for the electoral vote and it was overlooked, and the electoral vote, which had been publicly announced and was known to the community, was omitted in the return, though appearing on the tally-sheets and on the ballots which were strung and forwarded to the court-house with the return. When the county canvass began, six days later, the omission was discovered; the inspectors were summoned to the court-house and requested to correct their return. They could have been forced to do it under the laws of Florida. They reviewed their work, used the tally-sheets and other papers, and filled out a new set of returns which simply spoke the truth. Everybody knew it to be the true return. No objections were made to the course pursued, and the officers simply discharged their duty. The county canvassers accepted the return and included it in their county canvass.

It would have been strange indeed if the courts had sustained the effort to deprive the people of Hamilton County of their votes on such slender pretexts, especially when these mistakes and irregularities occurred through election officers appointed by the Republican State and county governments, who were not likely to act against those who appointed them, and no charge of corruption was ever made against either set or inspectors in connection with these matters. The only effort that was made to charge fraud upon the Democrats was in Jackson County, and it was upon this ground that the two precincts of Friendship Church and Campbellton were excluded from the count in the first canvass made by the State canvassing board.

This charge was based mainly upon the idea that all the colored people voted the Republican ticket. A miscount or substitution of 56 votes was alleged at Campbellton. There were two Republican inspectors and one Democratic, as was testified before the Senate committee by one James Gaston, a United States deputy marshal on duty there, and himself a Republican. A similar miscount of 23 was alleged at Friendship Church. And irregularities were charged at both precincts which, if true, would be sufficient to throw a cloud upon the result but for the fact that the Republicans had a majority of the election officers and would hardly defraud their own party friends.

There was much conflicting evidence. But the Democrats produced testimony to show that large numbers of colored men had voted the Democratic ticket secretly, because of the espionage kept over them and the persecution visited upon them by those of their color who were Republican partisans.

After the election soldiers were ordered to the county, and some affidavit takers accompanied the detachment from Tallahassee. No matter what may have been the intention of the officer who sent these troops or the disposition of the one who had immediate command of them, the Republican managers well knew how to take advantage of their presence. The ignorant colored men under this pressure were collected by scores and made affidavits in wholesale quantities.

No fair-minded man, who knows the political and social condition of the Southern States during the terrible period of the second reconstruction, can read over all the affidavits and testimony taken upon the Jackson County election about the time of the electoral contest, and give a verdict against the official result. And if they could, the whole loss to the Republican party which is claimed is less than their fraudulent addition to the Republican result at Archer precinct, No. 2, in Alachua County, which was proved beyond a doubt or a peradventure, and was afterwards admitted by the chief of the guilty actors.

The next county that invites our attention is Manatee. In 1876 this was far beyond all railroad communication. Some of the towns and settlements in its western borders could be reached by steam-boat, but the only means of travel to the larger part of the county was by stage or private conveyance to Gainesville, the most accessible point on the railroad, which was 175 miles or more from Pine Level, the county site. It was in an attractive part of the State, whither the tide of immigration was then drifting, and the vote was always on the increase.

The history of the transaction shows that it was a part of the programme of the managers of the Republican campaign in Florida to deprive the people of Manatee of all their elective rights in 1876, and rob the county of her vote.

During the month of October it was rumored that the Republican clerk had resigned, and notice of the rumor was sent to the Democratic State committee over the Cuba wire, which extended through the western part of the county. Upon inquiry at the State capitol the rumor was found to be true, and the utmost indifference was manifested about filling the vacancy, though at first the secretary of state talked fairly about the matter. The Democratic State committee offered to pay all the expense of carrying on the necessary correspondence by telegraph and to make a bond for the new officer, whoever he might be, at Tallahassee. This offer was not accepted, and the State officials pursued the usual course.

The office was offered to one J. D. Green, a Republican, and he was notified by mail of his appointment, but his acceptance and bond were delayed, and he did not qualify till after the election. The acceptance of the resignation only a month before the election by the governor, who was a candidate for re-election, and the delay in filling the office could have been for no other purpose than to prevent the registration of the new voters, in the hope that the election might be abandoned, or clouded if held at all.

But there were citizens of Manatee County who knew their rights and had the courage and intelligence to maintain them. The county judge, Hon. E. M. Graham, was an able and experienced lawyer, and under his direction all the formalities of the law were carried out as closely and fully as they could without the aid of a clerk. The county commissioners met and made arrangements for the election. The people assembled at the voting places as at the preceding election. Inspectors were appointed for each precinct. The boxes, papers, and forms that were necessary for holding the election, except the lists of voters which only the clerk could furnish, were sent out in due time. The inspectors were directed to allow none of the new voters, who had been unable to register, to vote, and to receive only the votes of such as had registered and voted at former elections.

As a new registration is not necessary at every election under the Florida law these were qualified voters. And in order that there might be no doubt as to the qualifications of those who actually voted, each voter was required to swear that he was so qualified before his vote was received. In this way a part of the vote of the county was saved. The election was orderly and quiet.

At some of the precincts members of both political parties participated in it; at some the Republicans remained away. The returns were formal and regular, and were duly canvassed and sent up to the State capitol, where all these facts were shown before the State canvassing board.

The vote as compared with that at the nearest preceding elections was as follows, and Mr. Graham testified that since 1874 there had been many changes of influential men from the Republican to the Democratic party:

Election.	Democratic.	Republican.	Total.
1872—Presidential	198	79	277
1874—Congressional	249	77	326
1876—Presidential	262	26	288

The only excuse for throwing out the county was that some of the formal requirements of the law were not complied with before the election. Why they were not has been shown. It was because there was no clerk, and some of the clerk's duties could not be discharged by any one else; but if the Republicans suffered any damage thereby it is manifest that it was because they willfully refrained from voting in the hope that by doing so they might discredit the election.

The other county that was attacked was Monroe, in the extreme southern part of the State, including the island of Key West, and the third precinct, one of the wards of the city of Key West, was excluded on the following ground, which appears upon the return:

> This precinct rejected on the ground that the inspectors adjourned before completing the canvass and resumed at a different place next day.

It was proved that the vote was canvassed regularly on the night of the election and the result publicly announced, and that the returns corresponded with that result so far as the electoral, State, and Congressional vote was concerned. The adjournment was made at midnight by general consent and without objection by any one, all being tired out with their continuous and protracted session, and two of the inspectors complaining that they were sick.

This gives the history of the rejected precincts and counties. The reductions left the Hayes electors in the majority, and I feel safe in saying that, even if the State canvassers had had the power to exercise the jurisdiction they attempted, it was not exercised so as to support the right. The facts have been spread upon the public record, and the future historian can refer to them when the time arrives for an impartial and correct history of this period.

The State canvass was closed early on the morning of December 6, the day fixed by law for casting the electoral vote; the result was clearly indicated a few hours sooner by the marching of a detachment of armed soldiers into the capitol yard, and they placed their sentinels around the building and the night was illumined by their camp fires. It was the cowardice of conscious guilt that prompted this movement, for Tallahassee was as peaceful and quiet as an Arcadian village, notwithstanding the near termination of this important act of the great drama that was being enacted in the presence of the American people.

But the Democratic leaders did not slack in their diligence. Proceedings were at once commenced to contest the result. An information in the nature of a quo warranto was filed in the circuit court of Leon County by the Democratic electors, one of whom was my colleague, who sued in their own behalf as well as in the behalf of the people of the State of Florida, and prayed due process of law against the Republicans who claimed to be electors to answer by what authority they attempted to perform the functions of electors, and further prayed judgment of ouster against them.

The information was served on the Republican electors, the court ordered a writ of summons to issue from the clerk's office, and the clerk issued it. It was served upon the defendants while collected at the capitol to cast the electoral vote of the State and before they had discharged the duties of their offices. In this proceeding all the questions of law and fact were raised and tried. The question of the jurisdiction of the court was put in issue and decided in favor of the jurisdiction. Issue was joined upon the merits of the case, and on the 25th day of January, 1877, a final judgment was rendered in favor of the Tilden electors and against the Hayes electors. The judgment was in the following words:

The State of Florida, ex rel. Wilkinson Call, Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, and James E. Yonge, vs. Charles H. Pearce, C. Humphries, W. H. Holden, and T. W. Long.

Information in the nature of quo warranto.

And now, on this 25th day of January, 1877, came the parties by their attorneys, and the court having fully considered what should be its findings and judgment herein, finds that respondents did not, as shown upon the face of the returns of the election held on the 7th day of November, A.D. 1876, transmitted to the Secretary of State from the several counties, and did not, in fact (as shown by the proof produced herein), receive the highest number of votes cast at said election for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of Florida. But that the relators did, as shown by said returns upon their face, and did in fact, as shown by the proof produced herein, receive the highest number of votes cast at said election for such electors. It is therefore considered and adjudged that said respondents, Frederick C. Humphries, Charles H. Pearce, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, were not, nor was any one of them, elected, chosen, or appointed, or entitled to be declared elected, chosen, or appointed, as such electors or elector, or to receive certificates or certificate of election or appointment as such electors or elector. And that the said respondents were not, upon the 6th day of December, or at any other time, entitled to assume or exercise any of the powers and functions of such electors or elector. But that they were, upon the said day and date, mere usurpers; and that all and singular their acts and doings as such were and are illegal, null, and void.

And it is further considered and adjudged that the said relators, Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge, all and singular, were at said election duly elected, chosen and appointed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, and were, on the said 6th day of December, 1876, entitled to be declared elected, chosen, and appointed as such electors, and to have and receive certificates thereof; and upon the said day and date, and at all times since, to exercise and perform all and singular the powers and duties of such electors, and to have and enjoy the pay and emoluments thereof. It is further adjudged that said respondents do pay to the relators their costs by them in this behalf expended.

A motion was made for a new trial and was overruled, and notice of an appeal to the supreme court of the State was given.

An offer was made to secure an early hearing before the supreme court by General E. A. Perry, now governor of the State, and my colleague, who represented the relators, but the attorney for the respondents declined an immediate hearing. In fact they never completed nor prosecuted any appeal, and the relators finally, under a rule of court, disposed of the proceeding by docketing the appeal and taking an order for its dismissal. The record of the action of the supreme court in this matter is as follows:

No. 11. Fred. C. Humphries, Charles H. Pearce, W. H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, appellants, vs. The State of Florida ex rel. W. Call, Robert Bullock, R. B. Hilton, and James E. Yonge, appellees.

Now come the said appellees (and having produced and filed a certificate from the clerk of the circuit court for Leon County, in which court said cause was tried, that an appeal had been obtained and bond given by said appellants) and move the court to docket and dismiss the appeal herein taken, because the appellants have, for two terms of this court, failed to file in this court the copy of the proceedings in the court below.

E. A. PERRY,
Attorney for Appellees.

JANUARY 15, 1878.

I, David C. Wilson, clerk of the supreme court of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the above is a true copy of motion No. 11, of the January term, A. D. 1878, as it appears on page 201 of motion docket No. 1, now in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said supreme court, at Tallahassee, this 14th day of May, A. D. 1888.

D. 1878.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said supreme court, at the court-room in the city of Tallahassee, this 5th day of May, A. D. 1888.

DAVID C. WILSON,
Clerk Supreme Court of Florida.

This could not be done until after the inauguration of Mr. Hayes, and was fruitless so far as the possession of the office of the Presidency was concerned, but it demonstrated the fact that by the judgment of the highest court in the State four of the electors who voted for him were usurpers, and without those votes he had, in good conscience, no valid title to the high office he occupied.

While the appeal prevented an execution of the judgment of ouster in the quo warranto proceedings, the efficacy of the judgment was not impaired by such appeal.

Meanwhile the attorney-general, constituting a minority of the canvassing board, certified to the election of the Democratic electors, but the governor refused them the usual lists and gave them to the Republican electors. The Democratic electors met at the State capitol, voted for Tilden for President and Hendricks for Vice-President, complied so far as was in their power with all the requirements of the law, and sent on the certificates of their action to the proper persons, one of them to the President of the United States Senate. These certificates were perfect except that they were not accompanied by the lists of the names of the electors made and certified by the governor, and this is not a constitutional but a statutory requirement, and such certificate was not regarded as essential by the Electoral Commission in the Oregon case. But if the evidence of their title was not present it existed, and the votes cast by them and certified actually represented the true result.

The questions of law and fact came before the supreme court of the State in another branch of the case, and while the electors were not parties and were not technically bound thereby, the canvassing board were, and it was through their action that the Republican electors obtained their possessory title to the offices whose duties they attempted to discharge.

The State canvassing board went on after completing the electoral result as already stated and by the same methods worked out a majority for the Republican candidate for governor, though somewhat smaller, owing to the difference between the State and the electoral vote.

Thereupon the Democrats applied for and obtained from the supreme court of the State an alternate writ of mandamus requiring the canvassing board to reconvene and canvass the returns as they appeared on their face or show cause to the contrary.

In this suit (which is reported in 16 Florida) the supreme court passed upon the whole case, the powers of the board of State canvassers, their duties under the law, and the actual result of the election so far as the State officers were concerned. They sustained the face of the returns, they decided that the vote of Manatee County was improperly excluded, and that the reduction in the vote of Hamilton, Jackson, and Monroe was without authority of law. I have that judgment here.

It is as follows:

State of Florida on the relation of George F. Drew, plaintiff, vs. Samuel B. McLin, secretary of state, William Archer Cocke, attorney-general, and Clayton A. Cowgill, comptroller of the State of Florida, respondents.

This day came the parties, by their attorneys, and thereupon the matters of law arising upon the relator's demurrer to the answers, original and amended, of the respondents, being argued, it seems to the court that the said answers and the matter therein contained are not a sufficient answer in law to the alternative writ issued herein, and that said return is insufficient. Therefore it is considered that a peremptory writ be awarded, directed to the said Samuel B. McLin, secretary of state, William Archer Cocke, attorney-general, and Clayton A. Cowgill, comptroller, board of canvassers of election of the State of Florida, commanding them that they forthwith meet and convene and reassemble as a board of State canvassers in the office of the secretary of state, to canvass and count all election returns on file in the said office of the secretary of state of the said election for the office of governor, held on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, and that as such board of State canvassers they "canvass and count the returns for said office from each and every of the counties of this State wherein an election was held for said office, and especially that they do canvass and count the said election returns from the said counties of Jackson, Hamilton, Manatee, and Monroe, and that they determine from a canvass and count and examination and tabulation of all the votes cast for said office of governor at said election in all the counties of the State, as shown by the election returns of said election received at the office of secretary of state, who has been elected by the highest number of votes to the said office of governor, as shown by the said returns, and that they do, as such board, make and sign a certificate, as required by law, containing in words and figures, written at full length, the whole number of votes given at said election as shown by said returns for the said office of governor of the State of Florida, and the number of votes given for each person voted for for said office, and in said certificate declare the result of the said election for governor of the said State.

And that they do perfectly execute this writ on or before the 27th day of December, A. D. 1876, and how they shall have executed it make return to our supreme court on that day by 4 o'clock p. m. in writing, to be filed in the clerk's office of said court.

The canvassing board then proceeded to canvass the vote for governor as directed by the court and reported their canvass to the court. The animus of the majority of the board, and perhaps I may with propriety say, their moral obliquity is manifest from their next step. They attempted to force upon the court a canvass of the electoral vote which had not been called for and could not have been in that action. In this canvass they followed the views of the court so far as the counties were concerned in which they had violated the law at the former canvass, but they were determined to make it appear that the Hayes electors had received an apparent majority.

They accomplished this by laying aside the full and honest vote of Baker County, which they had before canvassed and which was contained in the regular return made by the clerk and a justice of the peace and which was by their own official action pronounced genuine, and substituted for it the false and partial Driggers return, which they themselves had formerly rejected and condemned. They went further and rejected the entire vote of Clay County, which had never been attacked, simply because the county canvassers had failed to include one of the precinct returns in the result; in other words, because the people of that county had been deprived of 29 Democratic and 6 Republican votes, therefore they attempted to wrong her still further and deprive her of her remaining votes—287 Democratic and 122 Republican.

This return was stricken from the record by the order of the court, and the board was required to confine itself to its proper return of perfect obedience.

This was done, and the peaceful inauguration of Governor Drew, who had been elected by the Democratic voters, soon followed.

In justice to the judges who made this righteous decision I wish to call attention to the fact that two of them, Chief-Justice Randall and Associate Justice Van Valkenburgh, were Republicans, and continued so afterwards. The latter has recently died, and our people, without regard to party, lament his death and honor his memory. The third, although inclined to the Democratic party, had not been pronounced in his political views from the time of the closing of the war. They were all appointed by a Republican governor and held their offices by a life tenure.

The Legislature met early in January; it had a large and undisputed Democratic majority in both branches. It early addressed itself to the task of obtaining a true canvass of the electoral vote, so that the wrong which had been attempted against the State might be frustrated before its maturity and completion. A bill was framed and passed into a law on January 17, 1877, entitled "An act to be entitled an act to procure a legal canvass of the electoral vote of the State of Florida as cast at the election held on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876."

It ordered the State canvassing board to meet forthwith and canvass the electoral vote according to the construction of the law as declared by the supreme court in the mandamus case just referred to.

The law is in the following words:

Chap. 3049.—An act to provide for a canvass according to the laws of the State of Florida, as interpreted by the supreme court, of the votes for electors of President and Vice-President, cast at the election held November 7, 1876.

SECTION 1. The secretary of state, attorney-general, and the comptroller of public accounts, or any two of them, together with any member of the cabinet who may be designated by them, shall meet forthwith at the office of the secretary of state, pursuant to notice to be given by the secretary of state, and form a board of State canvassers and proceed to canvass the returns of the election of electors of President and Vice-President held on the 7th day of November, 1876, and determine and declare who were elected and appointed electors at said election as shown by such returns on file in the office of the secretary of state.

SEC. 2. The said board of State canvassers shall canvass the said returns according to the fourth section of the statute approved February 27, 1872, entitled "An act to amend an act to provide for the registration of electors and the holding of elections, approved August 6, 1868," and according to the construction declared and the rules defining the powers and duties of the board of State canvassers under said law, prescribed in and by the supreme court of this State, in the case of the State of Florida on the relation of Bloxham vs. Jonathan C. Gibbs, secretary of state, et al., decided in January, 1871, and in the case of the State of Florida on the relation of George F. Drew vs. Samuel B. McLin, secretary of state; William Archer Cocke, attorney-general, and Clayton A. Cowgill, comptroller of public accounts of the State of Florida, decided December 23, 1876.

SEC. 3. The said board shall make and sign a certificate containing in words written at full length the whole number of votes given at said election for each office of elector, the number of votes given for each person for such office, and therein declare the result, which certificate shall be recorded in the office of the secretary of state in a book to be kept for that purpose, and the secretary of state shall cause a certified copy of such certificate to be published once in one or more newspapers printed at the seat of government, and shall transmit two certified copies of such certificate, one to the presiding officer of the senate and one to the presiding officer of the assembly of the State of Florida.

SEC. 4. This act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Approved January 17, 1877.

The board met under this authority, and canvassed the returns from the different counties of the State with the following result:

Tilden electors.		Hayes electors.		Democratic majority.
Names.	Votes.	Names.	Votes.
James E. Yonge	24,440	William H. Holden	24,350	90
Wilkinson Call	24,437	Frederick C. Humphries	24,349	88
Robert Bullock	24,437	Charles H. Pearce	24,345	92
Robert B. Hilton	24,437	Thomas W. Long	24,344	93

Which is the same as the result I have already given. It gives the Republican electors the benefit of the Alachua County fraud committed at Archer precinct No. 2, the omitted precinct in Clay County, the wholesale additions to the Republican vote in Jefferson County, and the 73 little jokers which were smuggled into the box at Richardson's School-House in Leon County. There was no way of eliminating these errors and frauds, but they were not quite large enough to reverse the honest Democratic majority. After the announcement of this result another act was passed to cure and correct the wrong and error that had been done before it had operated to reverse the will of the people as declared at the polls. The act was as follows:

An act to declare and establish the appointment by the State of Florida of electors of President and Vice-President.

Whereas at the general election held in this State on the 7th of November, 1876, according to the returns from the several counties on file in the office of the secretary of state, and according to a canvass, and a statement and certification thereof, made by the secretary of state, treasurer, and comptroller of public accounts, under an act of this Legislature, entitled "An act to procure a legal canvass of the electoral vote of the State of Florida as cast at the election held on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876," Robert Bullock received 24,437 votes for the office of elector of President and Vice-President of the United States; Robert B. Hilton received 24,437 votes for the said office; Wilkinson Call received 24,437 votes for the said office; James E. Yonge received 24,440 votes for the said office; Charles H. Pearce received 24,345 votes for the said office; Frederick C. Humphries received 24,349 votes for the said office; William H. Holden received 24,350 votes for the said office; Thomas W. Long received 24,344 votes for the said office; and

Whereas, as shown by the said returns, the said Robert Bullock, Robert R. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge were duly chosen and appointed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States by the State of Florida, in such manner as the Legislature of the said State had directed; and

Whereas the board of State canvassers constituted under the act approved February 27, 1872, did interpret the laws of this State defining the powers and duties of the said board in such manner as to give them power to exclude certain regular returns, and did in fact under such interpretation exclude certain of such regular returns, which said interpretation has been adjudged by the supreme court to be erroneous and illegal; and

Whereas the late governor, Marcellus L. Stearns, by reason of said illegal action and erroneous and illegal canvass of the said board of State canvassers, did erroneously cause to be made and certified lists of the names of the electors of this State, containing the names of the said Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphries, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, and did deliver such lists to said persons, when in fact the said persons had not received the highest number of votes, and, on a canvass conducted according to the rules prescribed and adjudged as legal by the supreme court, were not appointed as electors or entitled to receive such lists from the governor, but Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge were duly appointed electors, and were entitled to have their names compose the lists made and certified by the governor, and to have such lists delivered to them: Now, therefore,

The people of the State of Florida, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows: SECTION 1. That Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge were, on the 7th day of November, 1876, duly chosen and appointed by and on behalf of the State of Florida, in such manner as the Legislature thereof has directed, electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, and were from the said 7th day of November, 1876, and are authorized and entitled to exercise all the powers and duties of the office of electors as aforesaid, and had full power and authority on the 6th day of December, 1876, to vote as such electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, and to certify and transmit their votes as provided by law, and their acts as such electors are hereby ratified, confirmed, and declared to be valid to all intents and purposes; and the said Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge are hereby appointed such electors as on and from and after the said 7th day of November, 1876.

SEC. 2. The governor of this State is hereby authorized and directed to make and certify in due form, under the great seal of this State, three lists of the names of the said electors, to wit: Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge, and to transmit the same, with an authenticated copy of this act, to the President of the Senate of the United States; and said lists and certificates shall be as valid and effectual to authenticate in behalf of this State the appointment of such electors by this State as if they had been made and delivered on or before the 6th day of December, 1876, and had been transmitted immediately thereafter; and the lists and certificates containing the names of Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphries, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long are hereby declared to be illegal and void.

SEC. 3. The governor of this State is further authorized and required to cause three other lists of the names of said electors, to wit: Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge, to be made and certified and forthwith delivered to the said electors; and the said electors shall thereupon meet at the capitol in Tallahassee and make and sign three additional certificates of all the votes given by them on said 6th day of December, each of which certificates shall contain two distinct lists, one of the votes for President and the other of the votes for Vice-President, and annex to each of the certificates one of the lists of the electors, which shall have been furnished to them by the governor, pursuant to this section, and the certificates so made shall be sealed up, certified, and one of them transmitted by messenger and the other by mail to the President of the Senate, and the third delivered to the judge of the district, as required by law.

SEC. 4. An authenticated copy of this act shall be transmitted by the secretary of state to the President of the Senate of the United States, and another copy to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

SEC. 5. This act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Approved January 26, 1877.

It declared the Tilden electors duly chosen and appointed.

It authorized the governor to certify lists of the names of these electors to the President of the Senate of the United States, and declared such lists as valid and effective as if they had been made before these electors had voted for President and Vice-President.

It declared the lists formerly given to the Hayes electors illegal and void.

It authorized the true electors to meet and make additional certificates of the result and attach to them lists of the electors as required by law. It directed copies of the act to be transmitted to the Secretary of State, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives at Washington. All this was done, and the action of the State as thus corrected by lawful and legitimate means was in the possession of the President of the Senate when the two Houses of Congress met to declare the result of the Presidential election on the 1st day of February, 1877.

Florida, through all the departments of her State government, had declared her action. The people had given the Tilden electors a majority at the polls, as declared publicly on the night of the election. The precinct canvassers in the several precincts of the different counties had certified a majority for the Tilden electors to the county authorities as the result of the canvass at the several precincts. The county canvassers in the several counties had certified a majority for the Tilden electors to the State authorities as a result of the canvass in the counties. The supreme court had laid down the true meaning, force, and effect of the law which must govern the board of State canvassers. The Legislature had directed the board of State canvassers to discharge their duty as to the electoral vote under the law as defined by the highest judicial authority in the State. The State canvassing board had declared the Tilden electors duly chosen and appointed according to law. The electors had met at the time and place required by law and discharged their duties according to the Constitution and laws, and their certificate, clothed with all the forms of law, was before Congress.

The Hayes certificate, which was also before Congress, was not based on the popular vote nor a true canvass of the result. The Hayes electors voted under a cloud, while their titles to the offices they assumed to hold were in litigation, which litigation had already been decided against them and a judgment of ouster was in full force, conclusively settling their title till reversed, and it never has been reversed. The only apparent advantage in their favor was the list of electors furnished by the governor which contained their names. But this was not only false, but it had been so declared by the courts, the Legislature, and the executive of the State, and following the law of the Oregon case before the Electoral Commission it should have been disregarded.

The act of Congress to provide for and regulate the counting of the electoral vote was approved January 29, 1877, after all these proceedings had been completed and after the true and valid certificate of the vote of Florida had reached the President of the Senate.

According to the terms of this act the two Houses of Congress met in the Hall of the House of Representatives on the 1st day of February.

The following powers were given to the Electoral Commission by this act, as appears in the second section (Electoral Count, page 5):

When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration; which decision shall be made in writing, stating briefly the ground thereof, and signed by the members of said commission agreeing therein: whereupon the two Houses shall again meet, and such decision shall be read and entered in the Journal of each House, and the counting of the votes shall proceed in conformity therewith, unless, upon objection made thereto in writing by at least five Senators and five members of the House of Representatives, the two Houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise, in which case such concurrent order shall govern. No votes or papers from any other State shall be acted upon until the objections previously made to the votes or papers from any State shall have been finally disposed of.

Under these powers the Electoral Commission reached the following conclusion as to the vote of Florida, and so declared in their solemn judgment (Electoral Count, page 196):

The commission also has decided, and hereby decides and reports, that the four persons first before named were duly appointed electors in and by said State of Florida.

The ground of this decision, stated briefly, as required by said act, is as follows:

That it is not competent under the Constitution and the law, as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence aliunde on the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Florida, in and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the board of State canvassers of said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not, and that all proceedings of the courts or acts of the Legislature, or of the executive of Florida, subsequent to the casting of the votes of the electors on the prescribed day are inadmissible for any such purpose.

With reference to this opinion I wish to say that the commission did not have to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate to obtain the proof of the action of the State in correcting the wrong and fraud of the first State canvassing board and the false certificate given by Governor Stearns. Such evidence was a part of the record.

They did not find that the people of Florida had chosen the Hayes electors; they only found that the first State canvassers had so declared and that Governor Stearns had so certified, facts which the whole country knew before the Electoral Commission was organized. They further found that it was not competent for them "to consider the proceedings of the courts or acts of the Legislature or of the executive of the State subsequent to the casting of the votes of the Legislature on the prescribed day." And all such evidence, though it was part and parcel of the record, and with the papers opened in the presence of the two Houses, was rejected as inadmissible.

The reasoning upon which the commission acted was clearly and forcibly stated by one of its members as follows:

When the agencies which the State has selected have acted, the State has acted; no power can reverse its action for mistake in law or fact, for fraud or for any cause whatever, unless it be a power higher than the State, on whom the Constitution has expressly conferred such authority.—Electoral Commission, page 959.

This reasoning denies the power of the State itself through any of its departments to correct or reverse any wrong, no matter how clear or palpable, unless the correction can be made before the vote is cast.

A more reasonable conclusion would seem to be that the State had control over the entire question of correction of error or prevention of wrong as long as the matter was inchoate and until the actual consummation of the wrong or error. If the right exists it is merely a question of policy as to when it should be exercised, and its existence is expressly recognized in a statute passed by the Forty-ninth Congress.

The act constituting the Electoral Commission gave to it all the powers possessed by the two Houses over the consideration and determination of the electoral result. By the later act referred to the power of correction is not granted, but it is clearly recognized, for, as is well said in the opinion upon the Florida case just referred to, "there is for this purpose no such power (i. e., the power to reverse its action) higher than the State."

I have always believed that the Electoral Commission should have looked into the papers opened in the presence of the two Houses for the purpose of ascertaining therefrom which of the two certificates spoke the true voice of the people of Florida. It would have been consistent with their reasoning as to the right of the States over the determination of this question.

The State had in an orderly way, through her courts, her Legislature, and her executive department, proceeded to investigate and determine who her Presidential electors were. Her courts had pronounced a judgment of ouster against the Hayes electors in a cause regularly tried in which these electors appeared and pleaded, and had declared the Tilden electors to be elected. They had passed their solemn judgment upon the correct interpretation of the statutes under which the canvassing board derived its power, and had decided that the board had violated the law in following the course which had led to the result by which the Hayes electors had received certificates of election.

Her Legislature had obtained a recanvass of the votes in accordance with the law as declared by the courts, which recanvass was regularly made in a lawful way, as prescribed by statute. The Legislature had passed a curative act, when the result of this recanvass demonstrated the falsity of the one previously made, before the court had interpreted the law.

The executive officers had, obedient to the law as enacted by the Legislature and in accordance with the true meaning of the statutes relating to elections as interpreted by the courts, ascertained the will of the people. This ascertainment had been duly certified by the chief executive, and the result of the election had been by him transmitted to Congress and the executive department.

If ever a wrong of this kind could have been righted there was no reason why this one should not have been. Effort was exhausted. The means were supplied. The remedy was in time before the spurious vote had poisoned the whole mass and changed the color of the final result, and thus wronged and defrauded the whole American people.

The State had done all in her power and was present with the judgments of her courts, which were entitled to respect; with her legislative acts, which were duly enacted, and with the formal and solemn declarations of her executive; and the Commission, in spite of the high powers given to it, said no authority can reverse the original action of the State for mistake in law or fact, for fraud or for any cause whatever. A deaf ear was turned to the State, and upon a plea of a want of jurisdiction her remonstrances were unheeded, and Mr. Hayes received the four electoral votes of Florida, notwithstanding her executive, legislative, and judicial determinations to the contrary.

A result thus reached, while it settled the controversy over the possession of the Presidential office, did not settle the question as to whom the people elected. That is a question that history must settle, and the facts and circumstances I have recited will not down at the bidding of any one. The contempt of no man, however high and powerful he may be, will prevent the future historian from making his investigations and reaching his conclusions. The case will be reviewed, every witness will be heard, every motive will be weighed, every document which may throw light upon these transactions will be searched and studied, and I have no doubt as to the final verdict. In fact, the absolute forgetfulness of Mr. Hayes by the American people since the expiration of the Presidential term that he filled is their verdict upon the facts of the electoral struggle of 1876.

In closing this subject I propose to group upon the record the opinions of some prominent Republicans as to the vote of Florida in 1876, and I shall select men who were in a position to know the truth, and some of them were actors in the scenes I have described, others were witnesses, but all have at some time expressed their views, and this testimony is against their interests and wishes, which of course adds to the strength and value of their statements.

General Francis C. Barlow, a distinguished Union soldier, formerly attorney-general of New York, a gentleman of the highest character and at that time a Republican, and to use his own words "pretty vehement" in his party opinions, went to Florida at the request of President Grant as one of the visiting statesmen.

The following extract from a letter of President Grant to General Sherman dated November 10, 1876, about the time he requested General Barlow and other gentlemen to visit Florida and other Southern States, will indicate the spirit in which the President expected them to act:

Should there be any grounds of suspicion of fraudulent counting on either side it should be reported and denounced at once. No man worthy the office of President should be willing to hold it if "counted in" or placed there by any fraud. Either party can afford to be disappointed in the result, but the country can not afford to have the result tainted by the suspicion of illegal or false returns.

He was present before the board of State canvassers during the entire contest. He mingled freely with men of both parties and had the opportunity of hearing all the witnesses and the views of the Republican leaders. Towards the close of the proceedings he was invited by Mr. Cowgill, one of the State canvassers, to give him his views and they had a talk on the whole subject of the election.

General Barlow says in testifying as to this conversation before the Potter committee:

I told him in conclusion that I did not see how on the whole the result of the electoral vote in the State could be fairly given to the Hayes electors; that with the application of the same rules, either strict or lax, to the Democratic and Republican side of the question, and the application of the principles which the courts have laid down in reference to whether a whole poll should be rejected for irregularities, I did not see how, fairly, the State could be given to the Hayes electors. I said that if I was in his place I should feel it my duty to vote for the Tilden electors.

That General Barlow made a formal report to President Grant in harmony with these views, and that he openly proclaimed them on his return from Florida, are facts well known to all familiar with this history. Dr. Clayton A. Cowgill, who sought the interview with General Barlow, at which the foregoing statement was made, was at the time State treasurer of Florida and a member of the board of State canvassers. He was a Republican, and afterwards voted to give the certificates of election to the Hayes electors. But at this interview held late at night, within twenty-four hours of the decision, and after he had heard all the evidence and the argument of counsel, General Barlow testifies as follows with reference to his declarations.

Mr. Cowgill seemingly assented to what I said. He seemed very eager to get what light and information he could and apparently agreed to what I said. I remember that finally he distinctly said: "I agree with you; I can not conscientiously vote the other way; I can not conscientiously vote to give the State to the Hayes electors." This conversation lasted some time, and finally we heard somebody coming. I said to Dr. Cowgill, "Do not go, because this must be one of our party friends, and I want to say before whoever it is what I have just said to you."

It was Governor Stearns who entered, and Barlow told him what had been said; but, some fresh influence operating on Cowgill's mind, he voted contrary to these conscientious views on the day following. Samuel B. McLin was another member of the board of State canvassers and its president. He was an extreme Republican and held the office of secretary of state. In June, 1878, he appeared before the Potter committee and filed a sworn statement he had prepared the previous March with reference to the electoral count of 1876, and while before that committee and under examination he reaffirmed the substantial parts of this statement. The following extracts are taken from this paper, and it appears in full in the second volume of the testimony taken before the Potter committee (Forty-fifth Congress, third session, Miscellaneous Document 31, part 2, pages 98 and 99):

[Paper purporting to be McLin's confession put in evidence, as follows:]

As a member of the late State board of canvassers of the State of Florida, I feel impelled by a sense of duty to myself and justice to others to make the following statement:

At the time the canvass was made I was not at any time conscious of acting otherwise than right and proper. I entered upon the canvass with the conviction that it was my privilege and duty in a political sense to give the benefit of every doubt in favor of the Republican party. I felt that where a question could be decided either way without doing violence to a public sense of justice, it was fairly allowable in politics that I should always lean to my own party, and give my decision in its favor, even at the hazard of straining a point. At no time did I feel that I occupied the position of a judge charged with the duty of a strict and nice weighing and balancing of all the evidence presented. Looking back now to that time I feel that there was a combination of influences that must have operated most powerfully in blinding my judgment and swaying my action.

I had been for many years and was at the time of the canvass a very active partisan. I sincerely thought that our State and the nation would suffer irreparable injury if the Democratic party were to obtain the Presidency and the policy of hatred to the negro should obtain control at Washington. It was the common and universal talk that the very existence of the men who in the South had upheld the Republican party depended upon the election of Mr. Hayes. Mr. Hayes would sustain them throughout the South, while Mr. Tilden would crush them.

I was shown numerous telegrams addressed to Governor Stearns and others from the trusted leaders of the Republican party in the North, insisting that the salvation of the country depended upon the vote of Florida being cast for Hayes. These telegrams came from those to whom I had been accustomed to defer; the chairman of the national committee and the man who was the nearest personal friend of Mr. Hayes had conducted the canvass. These telegrams also gave assurance of the forthcoming of money and troops if necessary in securing the victory for Mr. Hayes. Following these telegrams trusted northern Republicans, party leaders and personal friends of Mr. Hayes, arrived in Florida as rapidly as the railroads could bring them. I was surrounded by these men, who were ardent Republicans, and especially by friends of Governor Hayes. One gentleman particularly, Governor Noyes, of Ohio, was understood to represent him and speak with the authority of a warm personal friend, commissioned with power to act in his behalf.

These men referred to the general destruction of the country should Mr. Tilden be elected; the intense anxiety of the Republican party of the North and their full sympathy with us. I can not say how far my action may have been influenced by the intense excitement that prevailed around me, or how far my partisan zeal may have led me into error—neither can I say how far my course was influenced by the promises made by Governor Noyes that if Mr. Hayes became President I should be rewarded. Certainly these influences must have had a strong control over my judgment and action.

Reviewing my action at this distance of time, with all calmness, with my ardor cooled and my partisan zeal chilled by the President, who has basely betrayed and mercilessly destroyed the Republican party of the South, and crushed the very men who did so much for his election, I am persuaded that the Florida canvass was not conducted with that cool, calm judgment and honest, unbiased decision that should have characterized a proceeding involving such vast and important interests. Instead of this I now see that the whole proceeding went through upon the highest wave of political excitement; that partisan feeling, stimulated to the utmost by the most powerful agencies, usurped the place of reason and sound judgment, and political expediency ruled the hour.

A large number of precincts were either contested by the Democratic or Republican party; voluminous testimony was filed, and the lawyers of both sides argued, each for their side of the issue, that it was the duty of the board to throw out and not include in the count, or retain and count precincts, on the ground of illegality in the conduct of the election or fraud that was charged to exist. The attorney-general of the State and a member of the board had decided that the board had quasi-judicial powers, and had the right to exclude precincts from the count if the returns were shown to be so "irregular, false, or fraudulent as to prevent the board from ascertaining from them the true vote." With this view of its duties the board entered upon the work of the canvass with the conviction that they were invested with large discretionary powers, which were of a mixed character, political and judicial, the political largely predominating.

Partisan zeal and strong political bias had a powerful influence in the exercise of these powers, and the Republicans having a majority of the board, the canvass was largely in their favor, as the result proved. If the board had acted in accordance with the decision of the supreme court of the State, defining the powers and duties of the board in reference to throwing out precincts, since rendered, there is no question of the fact that Mr. Tilden would have been entitled to the vote of Florida. Excluding the return from Baker County, which was counted, and which I have since learned from the parties who made it, was a falsely manufactured return, and including the true return, which corresponded with the precinct returns of that county, would certainly have given the State to Mr. Tilden. Archer Precinct No. 2, Alachua County, was included in the count. The fraud committed in this precinct was not shown to the board by the Democratic lawyers, although a contest was made and much attention given to this precinct. But I have recently learned from the Republican leader of that county, that after the returns had been brought to Gainesville, the county seat, 219 votes were added to the returns by the inspector and clerk of said precinct.

In Leon County 74 small Republican ballots were stuffed into the ballot-box at precinct No. 9, yet it was not made to appear to even the satisfaction of the Democratic members of the board that those were false ballots. Subsequent confession shows that they were stuffed into the box. I had seen Joseph Bowes, one of the inspectors, have tickets similar to them a few days before the election, and cautioned him against their use, unless they were generally adopted, and afterward learned that he had given them up.

In Jefferson County, in a certain precinct at which Mr. J. Bell was inspector, 100 votes were surreptitiously added to the ballots and counted. No charge was made as to this fact before the board. The confession of J. Bell since made to me discloses the fact.

Had the 219 votes fraudulently added to the Archer return, and the 74 votes stuffed in the box in Leon County, and the 100 votes surreptitiously added in Jefferson County, aggregating 393 votes, been rejected and the Democratic rejected precincts which were excluded for irregularity and illegality, contrary to the decision of the supreme court, been retained and counted, Mr. Tilden would have carried the State. The conclusion, therefore, is irresistible that Mr. Tilden was entitled to the electoral vote of Florida, and not Mr. Hayes.

In making this statement my motives will doubtless be questioned by many, but the facts will stand alone as the truth, without any man's motives to sustain them. I am free to admit that, viewing things as I now do, and remembering that Mr. Hayes was continually inspiring his personal friends and trusted agents by every means in his power to secure for him the electoral vote of Florida and Louisiana, and believing it to have been a conscious wrong on his part, done with knowledge that he had not been elected, as his subsequent repudiation of Governor Packard, whose title was bound up in his own, and his willful and cowardly desertion of the very men who contributed so largely to his election have shown, my contempt for the pitiable littleness of the man is beyond my power of expression.

Mr. Hayes has denied the validity of his own title in denying Governor Packard's; he has ignored his Florida friends, showing that he believed them unworthy and tainted with a fraud; yet he holds on to the Presidency, which in his own opinion was secured by this very fraud. He has cowardly abandoned and betrayed his Southern Republican friends through fear of being ousted; that he believes he never was elected by the people.

Whatever may be the opinion of men in regard to my motives, I give them facts and leave my motives to a higher tribunal.

SAML. B. McLIN.

The views of the Republican chief-justice of the supreme court of Florida, E. M. Randall, and the associate justice, R. B. Van Valkenburgh, have already been referred to. The whole question was before them, and their solemn judgment was in favor of the Tilden electors.

L. G. Dennis was an active Republican partisan, familiar with all the circumstances. His sworn statement as to the Archer fraud, already submitted, and his testimony taken since the completion of the work of 1876, are conclusive as to the actual result. The record shows that he was indorsed by some of the leading Republicans of the country when he came to Washington to get an office in 1877 after Mr. Hayes was inaugurated. He plainly says that he warned one of the visiting Republican statesmen, who had a controlling influence in the management of the Republican interests before the board of State canvassers, and who wanted Dennis to go upon the stand as a witness, not to introduce him unless he wanted to lose his case. And he accepted the suggestion and Dennis was not called upon to testify.

The last Republican whom I shall now call is William J. Purman. In 1876 he was a Representative in Congress from the first Congressional district of Florida and a candidate for re-election. If the work of McLin and Cowgill in counting in the Hayes electors in the State was, as the Senator from Ohio claims, right and just, then Purman was re-elected. He participated in the entire campaign and was actively at work aiding his party friends in ascertaining the result of the election. He was as well informed with regard to the inside history of the election and count as any member of his party. He was a man of courage and was always aggressive in maintaining his rights. But he could not stand up before the facts of this case and contend for the seat in the other House to which the board of State canvassers had declared him elected. He voluntarily gave it up. He made no contest, and his opponent was afterwards sworn in without objection from him.

On the 14th day of February, A. D. 1877, he made a speech in the House of Representatives upon this subject of the then recent Florida election, from which the following extracts are taken, and nothing ever occurred in his subsequent career to cause any suspicion or charge that his distinct declarations that Tilden was entitled to the vote of Florida were prompted by self-interest. He spoke as a Republican having faith in his political principles, but believing that there was something higher and nobler than a blind adherence to his party, whether right or wrong.

In the beginning of his speech he said:

Mr. PURMAN. Mr. Speaker, there are times in the life of man when silence under painful circumstances is a synonym for caution, and duty undischarged may pass as only individual dereliction; but there come exigencies in the life of representatives, whether upon this floor or in other bodies, when silence is a crime and duty unfulfilled may be treason to conscience, constituency, and country.

Then, after giving some account of the period of the second reconstruction in Florida, he continues:

The Republican party in our State, with all its dissensions healed and with the whole machinery of the State government in its hands, went into the last campaign determined to win if our own resources and efforts, coupled with the most heroic devotion on the part of our voters, could achieve such an end.

Free speech and free locomotion were enjoyed to the fullest extent by the speakers and managers of both sides, and at no time during the campaign or from any portion of the State came up any cry of intimidation, with one or two minor exceptions. It was without exception the most peaceful election ever held in the State, and not one case of violence or disturbance on election day has come to my knowledge.

It seemed the peculiar privilege of the Republicans to win under all these advantageous circumstances, but it is a fact, sir, which I can not stand upon this floor and deny, and which every man, woman, and child in my State knows, that Florida was lost by the Republican party in the late election, and that the Democratic governor and the Tilden electors were truly elected. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

I make this declaration now under the most solemn sense of public duty and from an irresistible feeling of obligation to the people of my State, who have a right to expect that, however partisan their Representative may be in his political faith, he should at least on questions of public fact be an honest man. But, sir, I would not be understood in making this declaration as laying claim to any unusual amount of honesty or conscience, but I only assert my knowledge of the facts.

I love the principles of the Republican party, and for their sake have been singed by the fires of martyrdom, and I believe in the ultimate triumph of its regenerating mission, but I can not return to my State and look my constituency in the face if, standing upon this floor and in the presence of the American people, anxious and entitled to know the whole truth concerning this dangerous Presidential issue, I should shrink from the responsibility of doing justice to my State, and defending her honest political victory against the willful perversion of a bold, dishonest, and unscrupulous State canvassing board. [Applause.]

Should my Democratic colleague in this House introduce a resolution here declaring that the St. John's River had its rise in the southern portion of our State, flowed northward for hundreds of miles and emptied its waters into the Atlantic Ocean, I would be compelled to support the affirmation of the resolution for the reason that I would know the statement to be true, being personally acquainted with the geography of that country. Therefore for like reason am I compelled to give assent to any declarations which have been or may be made upon this floor that the Tilden electors were truly elected in Florida, and that only by "ways that are dark," and tricks that in this case have not proved to be vain, were these electors, and a majority of the people of the United States, defrauded out of their fair and lawful victory. But facts plainly expressed carry with them their own just weight, while jugglery performed with a number of facts only increases the task of explanation, without changing their character or relative weight.

Then, after enumerating the frauds that occurred in the election, he says further:

By this just and lawful proceeding the vote in the State would have stood 709 majority in favor of the Tilden electors. Viewed in any manner, whether in the light of law or fact, we can not escape the truth that the Democratic party really elected their Presidential electors in the State of Florida. This is no longer any question of doubt among the people in our State, who hold our republican supreme court in high esteem for learning and integrity, and whose decision they accept with confidence and acquiescence, although contrary to the hopes and interests of the Republican party in our State.

The Democratic governor-elect, Mr. Drew, was peacefully inaugurated at Tallahassee on the 2d day of January last, and I thank God and the good people of our State that Florida does not present the alarming spectacle of two rival governments upon her soil, both claiming to represent the sovereign will of the people.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 11087) to establish a circuit and district court at Johnson City, Tenn., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the following bills:

A bill (S. 3086) granting a pension to Victor, Gertrude, Margaret, and Helen, minor children of Lieut. George R. McGuire; and

A bill (S. 3087) granting a pension to Mary A. Pfeiffer.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1873) to limit the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. 7933) providing for the exchange of worn, defaced, clipped, punched, or otherwise mutilated silver coins of the United States, of smaller denomination than one dollar, for new or unworn subsidiary silver coin at designated places and under certain circumstances.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent that the regular order be laid aside temporarily that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the Chinese restriction bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes, which the Senator from Nevada asks may be informally laid aside for the purpose of enabling him to move the consideration of the Chinese restriction bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of bill H. R. 11336, a supplement to an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved the 6th day of May, 1882.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no amendment to the bill as in Committee of the Whole, it will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment and ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Having been read three times, shall the bill pass?

Mr. VEST. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon this question the Senator from Missouri asks that the yeas and nays may be entered on the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to submit some more observations upon the bill before it is voted upon. I find myself, however, this morning not physically qualified to do that, and I ask that the vote on the bill may be postponed until to-morrow morning, when I shall endeavor——

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no.

Mr. STEWART. No, no.

Mr. GEORGE. I make that request. If it is not granted I shall go on in the best way I can, though I do not feel as if I could do justice either to myself or to the subject. I have a headache and a sore throat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the vote upon the passage of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. STEWART. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada objects.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well; that is all right.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Are we to understand that objection is made, and that the bill can not go over until to-morrow morning at the request of the Senator from Mississippi?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair submitted the request to the Senate, and the Senator from Nevada objected.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to say that this is the first time in the history of the Senate within my recollection when a Senator preferred a request in such a manner as has been done by the Senator from Mississippi, stating that he was ill and unable to proceed, and yet would like to be heard, that he was denied the privilege of having a sufficient amount of time to enable him to properly present to the Senate his views upon a question.

Here is a bill which has not received consideration in either House of Congress by a committee. No committee of either House has considered the bill at all. It has been before the Senate, I think, for two days, and we are pressing it to a vote in this kind of a way, notwithstanding there is a treaty pending with the Chinese Government, and so far as the Senate knows the Chinese Government have not rejected the treaty.

It is now proposed to abrogate the treaty while it is before the Chinese Government for consideration, upon a bill which has never been before a committee of either House of Congress, which has only been before the Senate and under discussion for two days, and there is so much haste seemingly needed about it that the Senator from Mississippi, although ill, is compelled to speak upon the question to-day.

Mr. STEWART. I understand that the Senator from Mississippi is for the bill, and as to any remarks he wants to make on the Chinese question there is no limitation on him; he can just as well make them on any other bill or on any other measure. He can bring the question up and make his speech at any time; it will not cut him off. If he were opposed to the bill and wanted to assign reasons why it should not pass, I would not make the objection.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Nevada, why this great haste?

Mr. GEORGE. I would be glad to have the opportunity——

Mr. BUTLER. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Mississippi; but I wish merely to inquire of the Senator from Nevada, why this great haste?

Mr. GEORGE. All right.

Mr. BUTLER. I was simply going to inquire of the Senator from Nevada why the usual courtesy of the Senate should be violated in this particular instance and this bill should be railroaded through the Senate. I should be very glad if the Senator would give some reason for it. When I left the Senate Chamber on Monday the Senator had up for consideration the bill for the admission of Washington Territory, and he made a very earnest appeal to me to help him in its passage. When I came back I found that the Chinese bill had come in and that he had abandoned his pet scheme for the admission of Washington Territory and that this bill must be railroaded through the Senate.

I should be very glad, I say, if some explanation could be given why what I understand to be the usual courtesy of the Senate should be violated, and this bill hurried through in this form.

Mr. STEWART. I am the last man to violate the courtesy of the Senate, but several Senators who take an interest in the Washington Territory bill, among them the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], went away this afternoon supposing that the time to-day would be occupied by the Chinese restriction bill. They desire very much to be present when the Washington Territory bill is under consideration, and I told them that undoubtedly the restriction bill would be taken up to-day.

As I said before, the Senator from Mississippi is in favor of the bill, and if he wants to make a speech on the Chinese question he can do that at any time. Of course if he were opposed to the bill it would be against the courtesy of the body to refuse to grant his request, but he is in favor of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. That is not the question at all. The Senator from Mississippi has announced that he is sick and can not proceed without great personal and physical inconvenience. That is the point I make, and the Senator from Nevada insists that the Senator from Mississippi shall go on and deliver his speech when he is sick.

Mr. STEWART. I do not insist upon his going on with his speech. He can make his speech to-morrow morning.

Mr. BUTLER. That is not the point. The Senator from Mississippi wishes to speak to this bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not go on at this time if, as he states, and as I have no doubt is the fact, he is ill and can not proceed without great discomfort and pain to himself. I understand him simply to ask that the bill be postponed until to-morrow in order that he might then without pain and suffering make some remarks upon it.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Wisconsin, but——

Mr. STEWART. Under the circumstances I shall not press my objection.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall not press the request any further.

Mr. STEWART. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CULLOM. The objection is withdrawn.

Mr. STEWART. I withdraw my objection if that is the view Senators take of it.

Mr. TELLER. Then let us have an agreement to take up the bill to-morrow morning.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up to-morrow after the formal morning business, and that it be continued until it is disposed of without any intervening business.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand, then, that the request which I made has been acceded to by unanimous consent. Is that true?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not acceded to.

Mr. GEORGE. Then am I to proceed now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada withdraws his objection, and asks that the consideration of the bill be resumed to-morrow morning at the close of the formal routine business, to be proceeded with thence until concluded.

Mr. GEORGE. That would incidentally grant my request?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi would be entitled to the floor, if he takes it now for that purpose, when the consideration of the bill should be resumed to-morrow morning.

Mr. BROWN. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HOAR. Is there not something set down, by unanimous consent, for immediately after the routine business to-morrow morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] obtained unanimous consent that the question concerning the electric-motor street railway in this city should be considered at the close of the morning business to-morrow.

Mr. STEWART. Then I will put the hour at 1 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GEORGE. I will tell you what I will do. I shall go on the best way I can now.

Mr. FARWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall have to apologize to the Senate for the very desultory and disjointed way in which I shall discuss the question to-day for the reasons which I stated when I asked for a postponement of the consideration of this matter until to-morrow. It seems to be the wish of the Senate that I should proceed, and I will do so in the best way I can and to the extent that I may be able to pursue the discussion.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, in the outset I believe I shall allude to a declaration made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], intended to discredit anything that I or any other Senator upon this side of the Chamber who comes from the South may say because we have been slaveholders. That objection to our participation in the discussion of questions before this body has been made on several occasions, as if we who are here as American citizens and American Senators, representing with equal rights equal and sovereign States of the Union, are entitled to less liberty of thought and less liberty of speech than is accorded to other Senators on this floor.

I was a slaveholder. I was a slaveholder in a very small way, however. I was a slaveholder by inheritance. My father before me was a slaveholder. It was not understood in the section from which I came at that time that the holding of slaves was immoral or sinful. The Senator from Colorado yesterday twitted me with the banter that I would not get up now and say that I thought that slaveholding was a sin.

Mr. President, whatever may be my views upon the sinfulness or righteousness of slaveholding is a matter that I suppose no mortal man, no human creature within the broad limits of the country has the slightest interest in; and certainly I have thought—and that is the main idea that I desire to present in reference to that—that whatever may be my opinions now or whatever may have been my opinions heretofore upon the question of the sinfulness or the contrary of slavery, was not a disqualification to the proper performance of my duties as a Senator. In the one hundred years of our national life, including that dark, that perilous period of seven years in which we were contesting for the privilege of having a national life, it had not been regarded by the great body of the American people, or, so far as I know, by any considerable portion of them, that being a slaveholder in the present, much less having been a slaveholder a quarter of a century before, was any impeachment of the patriotism of the person thus situated or was any disqualification for the performance of the highest and most important duties which a citizen of the United States can owe to his country.

When George Washington was called to take command of the Continental Army and proceeded to Boston, then beleagured by the British forces; when from all the great men who adorned our history at that time the Continental Congress selected him as the hope and the foundation for any success we might have in our contest with the British Empire, it was not considered a disqualification to him that he owned slaves; it was no impeachment of his ability, of his patriotism, of his fidelity to the cause of the United States. So after relying on him during the seven dark years in which the weak and feeble colonies, in every one of which I believe at that time slavery was lawful—I say under him, a slaveholder, leading the weak and feeble, comparatively so, armies of these colonies against the strongest power on earth, the country reached freedom and independence. And during that whole time there was not one man in all this broad land who doubted that he would perform his duty as ably, as faithfully, as if he were a non-slaveholder.

And so, sir, after our struggles, through the Confederation, when it became obvious to the thinking men of this country that there must be a closer and a better union between the States than existed under the Articles of Confederation; when the great spirits, the great minds of this country were called in consultation to form a new bond of union, to form that Constitution under which we now live—and which, allow me to say parenthetically, if we observe it and obey it with fidelity to its provisions will continue for many ages to come, as it has in the past, to make us a great and prosperous people—when the great and the patriotic spirits of this land were called together to form this Union, and form the Constitution under which we live, that same man who, as a slaveholder, had led our armies through the Revolution was called to preside over the deliberations of the convention. In that same body the men who most gave shape and form to that grand instrument, that palladium of our liberties, were slaveholders representing slaveholding constituencies.

When the new Government had been formed, when in weakness we were inaugurating the experiment of free institutions in this country, surrounded by powerful nations looking on us and on the experiment with jealousy and with hope that it might fail; when it required the highest genius and the highest patriotism to guard and guide the destinies of the young Republic through the perils which surrounded it, that same man was called to the helm. He was a slave-holder still, and it was not regarded as an objection to him that he was known to be such. Slave-holders were in his Cabinet, and from that time until our unhappy civil war most of the great men—many were not in that position—but most of the great men who guided the destinies of this country, who made it honored at home and respected abroad by their patriotism and their genius, were slave-holders. Jefferson was a slaveholder, Madison and Monroe were slave-holders; Henry Clay and Andrew Jackson were slave-holders. I will not go through the list; you all know it. They were allowed free speech and free discussion in the councils of the nation, and it was not objected to them that their councils and their voices were not to be heard because they were slaveholders.

So I do not think that having been a slave-holder by inheritance, having twenty-five years ago lost my slaves, having, as I believe and as I aver, discharged all the duties of the relation of master to slave with humanity and with due respect to the unfortunate beings under my control, having acquiesced fully, freely, without mental reservation or evasion, in the destruction of that institution, having avowed my sincere conviction that I had no regrets for the destruction of the institution, that I would not under any circumstances for one moment harbor the thought or suspicion of its restoration, and that I am glad it has departed forever; having pledged my faith by a solemn oath to support the Constitution of my country, in which is embedded an article which declares that slavery is forever prohibited; having in no act of my public life and in no act of my private life violated or sought to violate that provision of the Constitution, and having since my service in this Chamber, as every member on either side of it can testify who has observed me, given expression to no sentiment and cast no vote which looked in a direction contrary to the article or provision in the Constitution to which I have alluded, I claim as an American Senator, acting under my oath to discharge my duty here faithfully to the people of this whole country, an oath which I intend to redeem in its letter and in its spirit upon every question on which I may be called to act—I claim after all this free speech as an American Senator; I claim the right of free discussion as an American Senator, and I claim that no impeachment either of the authority or weight of anything that I may say can be laid upon the fact that I was once a slave-holder.

Upon these sectional questions, and upon all questions on which I have been called to act as an American Senator, I have endeavored to act, and I believe I have acted precisely as I would have acted if I had worn the Union uniform during the war.

The war is over. It was a sad calamity to me and mine. If I have had one wish above all other aspirations since the unfortunate conflict ended it is that American politics and American statesmanship should be so conducted that the wounds on either side made by that fratricidal conflict might be healed; that there should be, as our fathers intended there should be, no division, no heart-burnings, no sectional lines in the United States. I have striven—and if I have failed in that it is because I was unable and too weak in the head to carry out the dictates of the heart—I have striven since the cause of the great quarrel which once divided us has been removed, that there should be no North, no South, no East, no West in politics, but that there should be such communion, such consultation and agreement by Senators and Representatives from all parts of this country as would seek no other end, no other purpose than to make all this country everywhere great, prosperous, and happy.

So, sir, I say it can not be fairly used as an impeachment of any argument I may make here that I once believed in slavery. Did you wage the war—speaking now to my Northern friends—did you wage the war for a real Union, or did you wage it for the purpose of subjugating a portion of the American people? Was all that bloodshed, was all that destruction and devastation which followed in the track of either army, only to make good that the Southern man, the Southern white man, should be the subject and the inferior of the Northern white man? If such was your purpose I did not so understand it. If such be your purpose now, commence your war again; for as long as I live as an American citizen, as long as any decent white man in the South shall live as an American citizen, I will and he will claim and will have for our heritage equality with all the other people of this country.

In the beginning, when your fathers and our fathers—no, I will not use that expression—when our fathers, meaning all, North and South, put their fortunes and the fortunes of the thirteen colonies to the perils and hazards of war, when they came after the war was over to erect on this continent the free institutions under which we live, it was understood that all were equal. The Union could not have been formed without such a sentiment; the Union can not be preserved without such a sentiment. It is not a preservation of the Union for one part of the country to hold in subjugation another part. That of itself is the destruction of any real union.

So, Mr. President, when I took my seat here, now about eight years ago, I entered into all the questions which concerned the American people and any part of the American people with the same determination to do what my heart and my head told me was right with reference to them, whether the particular section from which I come had an interest in that particular question or not. The very first speech I ever delivered in this Chamber (except one of personal defense into which I was precipitated very soon after I took my seat here) was to advocate a bill then pending before the American Senate to exclude the Chinese from this country. I did not vote for that bill, I did not speak for that bill, because the presence of Chinese in this country was a special injury to the State in which I live or an injury to the section from which I come. No Chinese were there, but feeling deeply from sad experience the dangers of a commingling upon the same soil of diverse races, and believing as I did then and as I do now, as expressed by a distinguished and great Senator on this floor, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], that the history of the world had shown from Aristotle to Webster, two thousand years, that homogeneity in races was a necessary condition of government, I voted as I did.

My own land was cursed with the want of that homogeneity, and feeling this deeply, when my brothers of the Pacific coast came here complaining that they were being ruined by the presence of the Chinese I went with alacrity to their help. In surveying the field I thought that whether African citizenship should prove a success or not—and about that I say nothing—at least it was such a perilous experiment that I would not inflict a similar trial upon any other portion of the American people. It was said—and I felt it—that these barbarians, unused to the comforts, unsupplied even in their own country with the necessaries of life, frugal, thrifty, capable of great endurance, came here and competed with the American laborer; I felt that their presence here was a hardship and an injustice to the men and women who by their labor create all our wealth and receive for their share so little of it.

I never believed in that sentimental doctrine which dedicated the American continent to the people of all parts of this world without reference to their fitness to be our political associates. I never believed in the inherent and inalienable right of any foreigner to come to America and become a part of our body-politic. I believed that this grand continent, won first by the heroism of the fathers of 1776, added to afterwards by the genius of Jefferson in the treaty under which he purchased Louisiana, and then enlarged by the genius of Winfield Scott and Zachary Taylor and their brave comrades to its present boundaries, was American ground. I believed it belonged to Americans and for such partners only from other countries as they might see proper to admit, and I did not believe that to that partnership—speaking now of foreigners, not the native-born—should be admitted any but those of the Caucasian race. If that be treason, then I am guilty.

So from the very moment this Chinese question arose in the American councils for legislative action the impulses of my heart and my head have been to carry out that idea and to keep this grand country of ours for ourselves and for our posterity and for foreigners only of the white race.

Mr. President, there are some observations that I desire now to make in answer to the speech made by the Senator from Colorado. I charge, and will make that charge good, that the lawful introduction of the Chinese into this country was the result of the action of the Republican party. I pointed to the treaty of 1868 as opening the door, which Republican Senators have said they were so anxious to shut, by which Chinese immigration should come. In that I was, sir, mistaken.

It was the first time the door was opened when we contracted that we would not shut it, pledged our national faith and honor that we would not shut it, but it had been opened before, not, as the Senator from Colorado says, by the treaty of 1844 and the treaty of 1858. In those treaties, which I have before me—I will not read them, but I have read them under the necessities of this debate, and I make this statement, that neither in the treaty of 1844 nor in the treaty of 1858 is there a single provision which gives a right to China or to Chinamen. Both were unilateral treaties, both contained stipulations only in favor of Americans, not one in favor of Chinese. They were commercial treaties. The treaty of 1844 broke down the Chinese wall which excluded us from trade with China. Under that treaty we went to China, with what rights? They were commercial rights in five ports, and five ports only. In getting these rights for our merchants, for our vessels, for our traders, we did not concede to China or to any Chinaman one single right of any character whatever. If I am mistaken in that, I ask the Senators who see my mistake to point it out. I challenge a contravention and dispute of that proposition. There is not a single stipulation in either treaty except to give to Americans rights in China; not a single provision to give Chinamen rights in America. And so when the Senator from Colorado said that there was but little difference between the two except in the provision in the fifth article of the treaty of 1868, he seriously erred.

When was the first door opened? Before I go to that, I suppose that I ought to say something about what we all recognize to be correct constitutional law upon that subject. It has been pointed out by the Senator from Oregon and repeated by the Senator from Colorado that Chinese came here in large numbers before the treaty of 1868. I confess I did not know as much about that as I do now since I have heard those Senators. I had heard no complaint of Chinamen being here before that time. I had seen no Chinamen here, and I had supposed that if there were any in this country prior to that time they were few indeed. But it seems there were a great many. They came here, as I understand, under the invitation of California; and it is good constitutional law that as to who shall come within the borders of a State, until the treaty-making power or law-making power of the United States is put in force, or until as a commercial regulation the United States shall act, each State acts for itself.

I am not prepared nor if I were would I go into a discussion of the question whether the people of California or the people of Colorado acted wisely in admitting the Chinese. That is for them to decide; it is a question for them to act upon. I have nothing to do with anything except with national questions and with the action of the Government of the United States upon that subject.

When was the national door first opened to the admission of the Chinese, and who did it? It was done in 1862 by a statute. The Senator from Colorado read one section of that statute, and found it convenient to omit the reading of another important section of it. The Senator read section 2158, being a section of the act passed in 1862, and he relied upon that to show that the Republican party had been against Chinese immigration very early. If he had read another part of that same statute he would have found that there was an express provision for the entrance of the Chinese here.

In the first place, the Senator entirely misconceives the legal effect and meaning of section 2158. He claims that that was a provision to prevent coolie immigration into the United States, when it has no such effect. I will read it, and I call the careful attention of the Senator to the reading of it:

No citizen of the United States, or foreigner coming into or residing within the same, shall, for himself or for any other person, either as master, factor, owner, or otherwise, build, equip, load, or otherwise prepare any vessel, registered, enrolled, or licensed in the United States, for the purpose of procuring from any port or place the subjects of China, Japan, or of any other oriental country, known as "coolies," to be transported—to be transported to any foreign port or place, to be disposed of, or sold, or transferred, for any time, as servants or apprentices, or to be held to service or labor.

Where? To the United States? No, sir—

It was simply a statute to prohibit our seamen from engaging in what is called the slave-trade with coolies. It had no reference to the importation of Chinese or Japanese into this country, and that is proved by another section of the statute, which I will read, and which the Senator from Colorado did not read, a section of the same statute, passed in 1862:

SEC. 2162. Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to apply to any voluntary emigration of the subjects specified in section 2158, or to any vessel carrying such person as passenger on board the same.

So in the very statute to which the Senator alluded as prohibiting the importation of Chinese into this country there is an express provision for their coming into this country. I was a little mistaken in my speech a few days ago in supposing and stating that the treaty of 1868 opened the door. It had been opened six years before that time by the act to which I have called attention. That act was in force and under it Chinese immigration was taking place year by year when the United States came to make the treaty of 1868, which was the cause of all our sorrows. If the matter had stood upon the statute it would have been in our power to repeal it at any time without any impeachment of our honor, without any charge that we had broken faith with another treaty-making power. It would have been then not only in our competency to have repealed the law but to have enacted one wholly prohibiting the Chinese from coming here.

But 1868 seems to have been a year of fruitful error in reference to these matters. We had the treaty, to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate again, because on that the Senator from Colorado and myself differ very much. The Senator said that Article V was nothing more than an abstract declaration of a doctrine which is called the American doctrine, but he was mistaken about that as he was about other matters.

I read from that article of the treaty of 1868:

ARTICLE V.

The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance—

If it had stopped there the Senator would have been right, but it did not stop there—and also—

They cordially recognize—the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from the one country to the other for the purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents.

It ceased to be abstract when this doctrine was expressly applied by the treaty to the coming of Chinese here and to the going of Americans to China. But that is not all of the treaty, Mr. President. You might say that was an ingenious argument. An ingenious man might get up a little argument to show that that did not mean anything. But if you will go to Article VI you will see something even more significant. Here was the statute of 1862 in force, and here is Article VI. After providing for the citizens of the United States visiting and residing in China, which was in the other treaties, they came on and for the first time said in this treaty:

And, reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation.

Here is an express contract by which the Chinese are to have the same privileges of visiting this country, of doing business in this country, and of residing in this country as an Englishman, or an Irishman, or a Frenchman, or any other foreigner. That makes it a little more than the mere abstract enunciation, as the Senator said in substance, of an American doctrine. It applied that doctrine by making it a treaty right that every Chinaman should come here, and reside here, and do business here upon the same terms and with the same privileges as the citizens of the most favored nation.

That is not all that happened in 1868 and along there. These are not accidental provisions. There had been a hallucination, there was then a hallucination in the public mind on these questions which showed themselves in statutes, and I shall read one of them. In the same year there was another statute passed. In the same month and within three days of this treaty there was this kind of a statute passed by the Congress of the United States:

Whereas, the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, etc.

The right of expatriation seemed to have been a favorite idea just at that time, and yet the Senator says all that means only this, that the right of expatriation is to be exercised with the consent of somebody else. Is not that a very remarkable inherent and inalienable right which a man can not exercise without the consent of somebody else, for just as soon as the consent is refused then the right instead of being inherent is lost, and instead of being inalienable it is taken away?

Now, let us stop a minute and think about this grand declaration here as to inherent and inalienable rights which can only be exercised by the consent of the country to which the man comes. Suppose the country does not agree to his coming, then what becomes of your inherent and inalienable right? Yet that seems to have been a hallucination which was very common in 1868. It becomes a mere inherent and inalienable right to leave one's own country—to throw off his native allegiance—leaving the party thus acting without a country until some other country shall see proper to receive him.

I wish to call attention to another act to show how the Government was bent at that time on Chinese immigration. On the 31st day of May, 1870, I find that the following provision was enacted by Congress, and it is incorporated in the Revised Statutes as section 2164:

SEC. 2164. No tax or charge shall be imposed or enforced by any State upon any person immigrating thereto from a foreign country which is not equally imposed and enforced upon every person immigrating to such State from any other foreign country.

That is a section taken from the civil rights act of 1870, a statute which everybody will recognize was passed to prevent any discrimination between citizens here on account of race or color, and whilst the Republican party were doing that in order to put the white man and the negro in the same bed and at the same table in social life in the South, and which the Supreme Court decided to be unconstitutional, they were so full of the idea of Chinese immigration and Japanese immigration and all that sort of thing that they incorporated in that very statute the provision which I have just read, so that no matter how objectionable Chinese immigration might be and however desirable Irish immigration and English immigration and German immigration and Scandinavian immigration might be, they just said to the States, "You shall not tax the Chinese any more than you tax the others."

As I understood the Senator from Colorado, the burden of his speech was to show that the Republican party had been all along fighting, striving to keep the Chinese out of this country. Yet here there were acts by which you not only invited them here in 1862, but you contracted in 1868 that they should come. And what was done two years afterwards? California possibly (I do not know about that, it may be the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Nevada or some of them can tell me) had commenced discriminating against and taxing the Chinese, or they were talking about doing it; and right then the Republican Congress said, "You shall not do that; you shall not tax a Chinaman any more than you shall tax an Irishman." That brings us down to 1870. How did we stand then?

Mr. MITCHELL. To what section of the Revised Statutes does the Senator refer?

Mr. GEORGE. About the tax?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. I refer to section 2164 of the Revised Statutes, which is a section of the civil-rights act of 1870, and I have read that this morning. It is a section of the act by which it was intended to make white men and colored men just the same, as if they were all the same color, only a little more so. In the civil-rights act you undertook to make the Southern white man and the Southern white woman the associate and companion of the colored man and the colored woman. Having got your hand in at that, you concluded you would make the Irishman and the Chinaman and the Chinese woman equals in all respects whatever. And yet you pretend that you love the Irish and to welcome them to our shores, and at the same time you would exclude the Chinese.

Those were your grand efforts, as detailed by the Senator from Colorado, to keep the Chinamen out of this country. First was your act of 1862, in which you prohibited the cooly trade between China and England and China and Brazil and forgot to prohibit it between China and the United States; and then, in another section, so anxious were you for the Chinamen to come, you put in a little provision that nothing said there should be construed into interfering with any Chinaman or Japanese coming into this country.

That did very well for one statute, Mr. President. Just for one stroke of the pen it did pretty well. But I suppose they were afraid that may be that the Democrats would get into power some time, though it did not look very much like it then; and in six years they concluded they would make a bargain with China; that they would make a trade; that they would pledge the national faith, the national honor, that for all time to come this natural and inalienable right of a Chinaman and of all mankind should be exercised by the Chinaman in coming to the United States and residing here permanently.

You were not satisfied with getting the Chinaman here by contract, but you contracted how he should be treated after he got here, and how was it? Just as good as an Irishman or an Englishman or a Frenchman or a German or anybody else, and for fear he would not be given the very best thing there was in the house, you did not specify these men, because somebody might be left out who was in a better fix, and so you contracted that they should be given the same rights, privileges, and benefits as the citizens of the most favored nation, so that there should not be anybody in all the broad world who could stand better or higher than the Chinaman.

Yet my distinguished friend from Colorado talked about my effrontery, I believe, in one part of his speech. I will not speak of his effontery. I will not say that. I am unequal to the occasion; I do not know what word to use. If I were to say "audacity" that would be about as mean as "effrontery," and I do not want to be as bad as the Senator from Colorado; but I will leave it out as being an occasion above my power to use the proper language, and I will just say this, that the Senator from Colorado says the Republican party were all the time trying to keep these Chinese fellows out. That is the way they kept them out!

We will go on a little further. My distinguished friend seems to have got this matter all wrong. I got a part of it wrong as to the time the door was opened and the number of Chinese who came here before 1868. I did not know anything about the statute of 1862. My attention had never been called to that matter. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] very kindly put me in possession of a lot of information that I did not have before, for which I am very much obliged. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Oregon for that information.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am always glad to be able to enlighten the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. These Chinese have come over here since away back about 1851 or 1852, as I learned from the Senator. They had been coming here in droves since 1850, and then they were invited by the act of 1862 to come in more, and now all these fellows are here, I suppose perhaps about two hundred thousand of them, everybody knowing what kind of a set of fellows they were. They found that out, because the Senator from Colorado, in order to prove up his Republican side, read a message or an inaugural address from Governor Stanford in 1862, which was six years before the treaty of 1868, in which Governor Stanford said it will not do at all to allow the Chinese to come, and he asked the State of California to take some measures to keep them out. They had been there; they were nuisances there; they were so bad that Governor Stanford had to call the attention of the Legislature to them in his inaugural address; and yet in the very same year that Governor Stanford was making that inaugural address to the Legislature of California here was the Republican party in the Congress of the United States passing an act that they should come in. Worse than that, Mr. President, six years after that time, when according to the Senator from Oregon they were coming in in shoals all the time, our Republican friends were so much in love with the idea that all men, whether they were black, yellow, or white, were the same thing exactly, and that a Chinaman was as good as an Irishman, with all these evils depicted to them, with Governor Stanford standing on the shores of the Pacific coast, in a State which had to bear the brunt of this immigration, warning them, in the language quoted by the Senator from Colorado, that these fellows would not do, warning them that they were destructive to our civilization, and all that sort of thing, they made the treaty. They did not do that ignorantly. They did it with their eyes wide open. So six years after all that they came and made the treaty of 1868 in which they bound us hand and foot so that we could not do anything. That is the way my friend from Colorado says the Republicans have shown their great anxiety to keep the Chinese out of this country.

I must hasten on, Mr. President. I am dwelling longer on this point probably than I ought.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator just one question? I do not want to detain him.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir; if I know it, I will answer it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it not a fact that the act of 1862, to which the Senator has referred, is a restrictive act, a prohibition to a great extent, and the first restriction on the right of Chinese to come to this country that was ever passed by the American Congress?

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator point out the restriction in it? Look at the supposed restriction right close. The Senator is a lawyer and a very good one, and he will find that it only restricts American vessel-owners from taking Chinese from China to some other country, not the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, no; I beg pardon.

Mr. GEORGE. Read it and see.

Mr. MITCHELL. It simply restricts them from exercising a right they could exercise before the passage of that act.

Mr. GEORGE. It was regarded as a species of slave trade, and it was confined to that. I read it here to the Senate. It is confined exclusively to preventing that.

Mr. MITCHELL. To what section does the Senator refer?

Mr. GEORGE. To the first one, the one the Senator from Colorado read yesterday.

Mr. MITCHELL. The first section?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes. Read that carefully, and you will find that I am right about it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Section 2158 reads as follows:

SEC. 2158. No citizen of the United States, or foreigner coming into or residing within the same, shall for himself or any other person, either as master, factor, owner, or otherwise, build, equip, load, or otherwise prepare any vessel registered, enrolled, or licensed in the United States, for the purpose of procuring from any port or place the subjects of China, Japan, or of any other oriental country, known as "coolies," to be transported to any foreign port——

Mr. GEORGE. To some other port.

or place, to be disposed of, or sold, or transferred, for any time, as servants or apprentices, or to be held to service or labor.

"Any foreign port," I submit in all candor to the Senator from Mississippi, includes any port in the United States, which was a foreign port so far as the coolies were concerned.

Mr. GEORGE. I thought that all ports of the United States were domestic ports and not foreign ports.

Mr. MITCHELL. A United States port is "foreign" to the place from which the coolies started.

Mr. GEORGE. It does not say foreign to China; it just says "foreign." When an American statute speaks of a foreigner or anything foreign it means something foreign to this country.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Mississippi is too good a lawyer and has been too long on the bench to seriously advocate any such construction of the section as that.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not going to argue that two and two make four; but I hope I will be pardoned for repeating that when the word "foreign" is in a statute of the United States without words qualifying its meaning, it means something foreign to this country and not foreign to any other country.

Mr. MITCHELL. What was the object of the law? Look to the reason of the thing.

Mr. GEORGE. One of the first things I learned in studying law was that you are to look at the words of the statute where they are plain and unequivocal.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. China is a foreign country.

Mr. MITCHELL. The object of the law, the Senator must admit, was to prevent the bringing of coolies into the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know whether that was the object or not.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly it was. That was the object of the law unquestionably.

Mr. GEORGE. The law is so plain that I do not care to argue it any more.

As the principal quarrel between the Senator from Colorado and myself is about the action of the Republican party, I believe I will address my remarks now somewhat further to the action of the Republican party in this matter. The Senator takes great comfort from a resolution introduced in the Republican convention of 1876 by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], and he says that means terrible things in the way of excluding Chinese from this country. What was the resolution as quoted by the Senator?

Since the authority to regulate immigration and intercourse between the United States and foreign nations rests with Congress, or with the United States and its treaty-making power, the Republican party, regarding the unrestricted—

Not the immigration of the Chinese, not any immigration of Chinese, but—the unrestricted immigration of the Chinese as an evil of great magnitude, invokes the exercise of those powers—

To do what? To prohibit the immigration of Chinese? Not a word of it. This bill prohibits. The complaint was of "unrestricted immigration." If they could just get restricted immigration, that was all they wanted. He did not say how much restriction he wanted, but he wanted it restricted. "Unrestricted immigration" was too much for him. And then what did they ask Congress to do?

To restrain and limit that immigration by the enactment of such just, humane, and reasonable provisions as will produce that result.

That was a mere tub thrown to the whale. It amounted to nothing. But in 1880 the convention of the Republican party made another ex cathedrâ declaration upon that question, to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate if I can find it in my notes. I know this is a very dreary subject, and I know I am not performing my part very well, for the causes I have stated when I asked for postponement; but as nobody will know when he comes to read what I say in the RECORD how badly I delivered it, I suppose I may as well go on.

In 1882 there was somebody else just like the Senator from Colorado who was insisting that the Republican platform of 1880 authorized and commanded the passage of laws by Congress to restrict this immigration. I want to read the language of a very distinguished Senator who, I suppose, has about as much right to speak for the Republican party as any man on this floor. He said:

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not think that anything will be gained by entering upon an extended discussion of a measure which has very recently received so thorough and careful an examination at the hands of the Senate. I suppose the bill, either with or without the amendment which has been adopted, is destined to pass. I wish before it passes to put on record my certain conviction—

And by the way, in order to save time, I want to call the attention of the Senate to a good many other propositions in what I am reading besides the main point-- my certain conviction that the opinion which has come from a large body of the most intelligent people of the country, from the organs of the great denominations of Christians, from the representatives of the communities which have owed their prosperity, their power, their happiness to the respect in which the labor on which they are based has been held—I say I think this opinion is sure, sooner or later, is sure very speedily, to prevail in reversing the policy on which we now seem about to enter.

That is, in passing the Chinese exclusion bill of 1882.

I believe that the Pacific coast itself will come back very soon to the doctrine of the eloquent resolution framed by my honorable friend from California a few years ago as a representative of the Republican convention of his State, of which he was a leading member. It is impossible, it is incredible that a blow at the dignity of human nature, a blow at the dignity of labor, a blow at men, not because of their individual qualities or characters, but because of the color of their skin, should not fail to be a subject of deep regret and repentance to the American people in the nineteenth century.

I do not, however, rise to reargue this question or to reaffirm my own individual opinion. The conviction with which I have started has been deepened and re-enforced by the expressions of sentiment which have come from the sober, religious sense of this country. It has been strengthened also by the exhibition of the true character of the leaders of the sentiment which has demanded and secured the passage of this bill, which we have seen in the press of the section of country from which it comes.

I wish, however, to refer in a single word to one charge which has been frequently made, and that is that those members of the Republican party—

And to this I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado. I might have omitted the reading of all the other, but it was good to have it read and put in the RECORD, and I wanted it in—

I wish, however, to refer in a single word to one charge which has been frequently made, and that is that those members of the Republican party who have resisted the passage of this measure have violated the pledges with which they asked the support of the American people at the recent Presidential election. I was in a condition, I think, to know something of the opinion and purposes of the men who composed the great Republican national convention of 1880. I was also in a condition to know something of the opinion of the great statesman and soldier and martyr and lover of liberty who was the standard-bearer of my political associates in that memorable campaign. It is a dishonor to both to charge that they asked the support of the American people by pledging themselves to the principles upon which this legislation is based.

General Garfield, I believe, would have gone to the stake, he would have put his right hand into the flames like Cranmer, before he would have accepted the Presidency or have subscribed his name to a declaration involving such a blow to the dignity of labor and the dignity of American humanity as is involved in this bill.

This is what the Republican national convention declared. I stand, and am ready to stand in the future, by every word and letter and syllable of the declaration.

Now, I will read that declaration:

Since the authority to regulate immigration and intercourse between the United States and foreign nations rests with the Congress of the United States and the treaty-making power, the Republican party, regarding the unrestricted immigration of the Chinese as a matter of grave concernment, under the exercise of both these powers, would limit and restrict that immigration by the enactment of such just, humane, and reasonable laws and treaties as will produce that result.

The same idea exactly as the resolution offered in 1876 by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. Here is the comment of the Senator from whom I am reading:

That is, the regulation of immigration and intercourse. Then General Garfield in his letter of acceptance stated the doctrine to which he understands he is committed by accepting the nomination of that party upon that platform. He said:

"The material interests of this country, the traditions of its settlement, and the sentiment of our people have led the Government to offer the widest hospitality to emigrants who seek our shores for new and happier homes, willing to share the burdens as well the benefits of our society, and intending that their posterity shall become an undistinguishable part of our population."

Then says the Senator:

Is that like an enactment that no Chinese shall ever be naturalized in the American Republic?

"The recent movement of the Chinese to our Pacific coast partakes but little of the qualities of such an immigration either in its purposes or its result. It is too much like an importation to be welcomed without restrictions, too much like an invasion to be looked upon without solicitude. We can not consent to allow any form of servile labor to be introduced among us under the guise of immigration. Recognizing the gravity of this subject, the present administration, supported by Congress, has sent to China a commission of distinguished citizens for the purpose of securing such a modification of the existing treaty as will prevent the evils likely to arise from the present situation. It is confidently believed that these diplomatic negotiations will be successful without the loss of commercial intercourse between the two powers, which promises a great increase of reciprocal trade and the enlargement of our markets. Should these efforts fail, it will be the duty of Congress to mitigate the evils already felt and prevent their increase by such restrictions as, without violence or injustice, will place upon a sure foundation the peace of our communities and the freedom and dignity of labor."

That ends the quotation from Mr. Garfield. I am reading from a speech made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. That Senator continues:

Mr. President, I reaffirm for myself, and for the people whom I immediately represent, every syllable of that eloquent declaration. I am willing to join my friends from the Pacific coast in regulating immigration so as to extirpate, root and branch, every form of cooly labor. I am willing to plant at the outer gateways of this Asiatic nation vigilant and competent consular agents, without whose certificate no man shall come to our shores whose labor is not his own property; who does not come with his family, if he has a family; who does not come under the fair promise that he is likely to take upon himself in good faith the responsibilities, the duties, and the opportunities of American citizenship.

Not an evil has been suggested in the petition and complaints that have come from the Pacific coast against which I will not join with its representatives in striking a hard and fatal blow. But I will not strike at an honest, industrious, temperate Christian laborer because I am afraid that his labor is more skillful than mine or than the labor of the men of my race. I will not deny to the Chinaman any more than I will to the negro or the Irishman or the Caucasian the right to bring his labor, bring his own property to our shores, and the right to fix such a price upon it as according to his own judgment and his own interest may seem to him best.

I denounce this legislation not only as a violation of the ancient policy of the American Republic, not only as a violation of the rights of human nature itself, but especially as a departure from the doctrine to which the great party to which I belong is committed in its latest declaration of principles, and to which our great martyred chief, whom we were so proud to acknowledge as our standard-bearer, affixed his declaration in almost the latest public act of his distinguished life.

So the Senator from Colorado will see that the platform of 1876, which I have just remarked is substantially the same as the platform of 1880, almost in the same words, as interpreted by one of the most distinguished members of his party, is not in accord with the views which he expressed yesterday; or, in other words, that there is nothing in that platform which justifies the present bill and nothing even which justified the bill which we passed in 1882. I will let that answer the argument of the Senator upon that point.

I showed some days ago in a short speech I made then that the bulk of the Republican party in the Senate voted in favor of striking out from the House bill in 1882 the clause which prohibited Chinese naturalization. I stated that fact. I think I was interrupted then by a suggestion or by a question that that was unnecessary, that the law already prohibited it, and that there was no such practice. It had been a good while since these matters came before me and I only had a dim recollection of them, and so stated at the time; but it was stated in that debate that Chinese were actually being naturalized by State courts in the United States. Upon that subject I desire to read something from that debate. On the motion to strike out section 14, which is in the following words:

That hereafter no State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship; and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed—

Mr. Farley, of California, said:

Mr. FARLEY. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. For many reasons I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate just now in the discussion of this amendment. At the time that it was put into the first bill I know that some distinguished Senators took the ground that there was no necessity for this provision, because the statute already provided for it. But, notwithstanding that statute, the courts have been naturalizing Chinamen; and I shall insist on the rejection of the amendment at this time.

Nobody controverted that statement made by Senator Farley. That matter came up again in the debate in a colloquy between Mr. Farley and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. Senator Farley said:

Will the Senator—

Speaking to Senator HAWLEY—

Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. FARLEY. Were they naturalized in the State of Connecticut, or where were they naturalized?

Mr. HAWLEY. They were naturalized in Connecticut, I believe. One of them I know was a graduate at Yale College, had taken prizes in English composition there, and was regarded as a man of superior ability and education.

So I was right in stating that it was a then present emergent evil that required legislation, that the practice was going on.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator state that under the law as it existed at that time Chinese could be rightfully or legally naturalized in this country?

Mr. GEORGE. I have not examined that question very fully, but my present impressions are that they had no right to be naturalized. That is my impression.

Mr. MITCHELL. At the time when the amendment was voted down?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, I will state that—at the time the amendment was voted on.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the Senator is right in that.

Mr. GEORGE. I have not examined that matter very thoroughly, though, but there seems to have been a doubt about it. The Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] tells me, in addition to what I have stated here, that they naturalized about seven Chinamen in Indianapolis, Ind., a very enlightened State with a very intelligent State court, and then there was the statement made made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that they were naturalizing them in Connecticut, and I think that one of the most beneficent acts, and one of the most judicious grounds of legislation is to remove a doubt upon a statute and to prevent misconstructions of the statute by the courts of the country, and so it appears——

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. DOLPH. Is the Senator able to state by what court, at what place, or by what judge Chinese were naturalized in Indiana?

Mr. GEORGE. I have just read from Senator HAWLEY.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask as to Indiana.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Texas gave me that information. I have seen something in the newspapers about Chinese being naturalized in Indianapolis.

Mr. DOLPH. That statement has been made in the Senate before, but we are not able to ascertain where to look for the authority for it.

Mr. REAGAN. If the Senator from Mississippi will allow me, I will state that I saw an address printed in a St. Louis paper a few days ago, made by the district attorney or assistant district attorney of the United States, lately a State senator of Indiana, in which he gives the record proving that seven Chinamen were naturalized in Indianapolis and voted there against Democratic protest.

Mr. DOLPH. Is the Senator able to state from recollection or otherwise what that record was, before what court or what judge, or in what town?

Mr. REAGAN. It was the record of a State court.

Mr. GEORGE. Well, they were naturalized. I want to bring now before the Senate the opinions of distinguished Republicans to the effect that they ought to be naturalized, that they were proper subjects of naturalization. I have not got my marked copy of the RECORD here and I may have to read a little more——

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me find this now.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask him a question with reference to naturalization. Does the Senator regard a Chinaman in the proper sense of the term a white man?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not.

Mr. TELLER. Does not the Senator know that there has been in the statute since 1804 a provision that persons to be naturalized must be white men?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know that it is exactly that way.

Mr. REAGAN. If the Senator appeals to me I think I can produce the decision of the State court of Indiana which has been referred to.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Colorado will agree with me when I state my position.

Mr. TELLER. Let me call attention to the statute.

Mr. GEORGE. I know what the statute is. In 1804 there was a statute passed, and I believe before that, in 1791, the first statute was passed for the naturalization of white men. In 1870 it was extended to persons of African descent.

Mr. TELLER. To Africans only; so that it includes only white men and Africans, not Asiatics.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. GEORGE. I shall never get through if I am constantly interrupted.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to know if he is aware that the present House amended the bill which was recently passed so as to repeal the provision of the act of 1882 which provided that no court should naturalize a Chinaman; and does he know whether that was done under the impression——

Mr. GEORGE. You must not ask me as to my knowledge. I do not know much. If the Senator only wants to find out the extent of my information I will admit that I am very ignorant.

Here is what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] said about it after the colloquy in which he stated that they were naturalizing Chinese in his State:

Therefore I conceive that the argument against cooly immigration has no force here for the reason that it is already sufficiently forbidden by statute twenty years old, and for the further reason that there is none, and there is no tendency of it toward this country, because cooly emigration is punished by beheading in China.

The Chinese immigration, while it affords a serious question to the people of the California coast, and I sympathize with certain of their feelings, has not, in my judgment, reached anything like the threatening proportions which have been represented. I am sorry it is not distributed more throughout the country, for I appreciate the painfulness of my position in discussing a matter that does not immediately affect my own State at all, and I am willing to contribute to the charitable and sympathetic feeling for those who sincerely feel themselves afflicted.

I wish we could have some sympathetic feeling of that sort sometimes from Northern Senators about troubles that are equally as distressing to some other sections of the country.

I am willing to regulate the immigration. I think the Chinese Government is willing. I am willing to limit it; to restrict it. I admit, nay more, I assert, the right of a government to defend itself against a hostile or dangerous immigration. It is a question of fact as to whether this is such. It is a further question for rightful consideration whether we are wisely legislating against it even if there be an evil. If we could suppose a bill that should admit only such Chinamen as came with their families, and admit such only as came with a purpose to permanent settlement with us, admitting none to be citizens and voters unless they should be able to speak and read the English language, you certainly could defend such a bill with much more consistency than you can defend this bill as it stands with the clause forbidding naturalization, because that makes no distinction upon the ground of merit, or education, or intelligence, or patriotism. It simply excludes a man by reason of his race or color, and we have said as emphatically as we could to the world that no man should be excluded for that reason.

An exclusion based purely upon race or color is unphilosophical, unjust, and undemocratic.

That is enough to read of that. I call attention now to what I have read from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] upon that subject. There are one or two other authorities of weight that I desire to call the attention of the Senate to.

This was in 1882. We had a bill passed here in 1886, and that passed without much debate, but there were some Senators who opposed it even then.

I have not gone through all the speeches of Senators. I have quoted only from those of great eminence and of great weight in the Republican party. There are others I might say of almost equal standing and weight that I have overlooked, because I do not desire in my present condition to occupy the attention of the Senate a great deal longer.

This is four years afterwards. I want to read from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] again:

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator from Ohio who reported this bill does not propose to address the Senate further. I think I ought not to let the occasion pass without at least expressing my own protest with regard to this entire proceeding.

This proposed act, and the statute of which it is an amendment, and the treaty which those two statutes profess to carry into effect, will in my judgment be regarded, if civilization be preserved on this continent, in future ages as among the great blots on the history of the human race. Here is legislation aimed at men, not on account of any individual crime or inferiority or fault, but simply because they are laborers and because they belong to a certain race; and that in defiance of the two great foundation principles of this Republic: that labor is honorable, and that there ought to be no distinction between human beings in their privileges on account of race.

The motive for this legislation is not, as will be confessed in private by every intelligent man who seeks it, any fault, wrongdoing, or inferiority of the classes sought to be affected, but because American skill, American industry, and American intelligence fears that it shall be beaten in the race for wealth, and for employment, and for power.

There is more of the same sort which it is not necessary to read. At another part of the same speech the Senator from Massachusetts used this language:

If there were not a rivalry between the two political parties of this country for the political vote of the Pacific coast this legislation would be received, in my opinion, with universal execration from all intelligent and humane men. I do not propose to be led by any real or fancied political necessity into a departure from those principles of human freedom and human rights in which I have been educated, which have been the ornament and glory of my own State and my own country, and in departing from which every nation sooner or later is sure to encounter its just and ordained punishment.

I do not propose, for one, to repeat for myself or to see others repeat without a protest the miserable history of the years which preceded the war, preceded the year 1850, when the two great parties of the country undertook to vie with each other in bidding for the votes of the supporters of slavery. I deem this Chinese legislation in principle a repetition of that disgrace. I do not mean to have on my own record or to leave to my children any share in the blame.

Mr. President, I have been reading from these Senators, not with the view of bringing upon them any reproach whatever for the expression of these opinions, but to show that leading men, able men, justly esteemed as leaders in the Republican party, made the declarations which I have read; and now I want to read from another. This one is very short. I read from a speech made by the Senator from Kansas, now occupying the chair [Mr. INGALLS], in 1886:

The Senator from Ohio states that he does not desire to renew the discussion of four years ago, and accuses the Senator from Massachusetts of knight-errantry, intimating that he is a Don Quixote fighting wind-mills, and perhaps that I am his Sancho Panza [laughter], because we venture to ask that a great measure of this kind—

Now comes the language to which I desire to call attention specially—because we venture to ask that a great measure of this kind, which I affirm is a disgrace to American civilization, shall not be passed through here without discussion.

That was the bill of 1886, the last bill that was passed on the subject. Now, I read from two Senators, of course we all respect them both as high, eminent, and leading statesmen, one of whom has received the indorsement of the majority of his party as President of the Senate, and the other, I believe, received the rest of the Republican votes in caucus for that position.

With all this record the Senator from Colorado gravely insists that this Chinese restriction matter has encountered mainly opposition from the Democrats all the way through, and that the matter of Chinese admission is altogether a Democratic measure and opposed by the Republican party. Well, I can say nothing more than I have said as to that. There is the record, and there is the record which you made. There is the record which your party made; it stands for itself, and it can not be answered before the American people by the charge that the Senator who brings it before them has been a slave-holder.

There is another little piece of history in Congress which I will read to the Senate, which shows how the party stood, and, by the way, if I could lay my hands on it I should like to read some from the other Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES]. Everybody knows that that Senator has long been a leader in the councils of his party, and his expressions in 1882 were as strong and in the same line with those of his colleague. If I can find his remarks I will read them. If I do not I hope I shall be allowed to put them in the RECORD, because I want the people of this country to know what my distinguished friend from Massachusetts thinks about it or did think about it. I do not know whether he thinks that way now or not. I do not know whether he has been converted by what is called in debate here "the unanimous demand of the American people for this kind of legislation."

This other little piece of history to which I propose to allude will go to confirm the statement of the Senator from Colorado that the Republican party has been breaking its neck here for several years to try to stop Chinese immigration! On May 1, 1882, a very important act occurred in the House of Representatives. In view of the fact that the Senator from Colorado draws a distinction between the abrogation of treaties and the violation of treaties, let us see how the Republican party stood in 1882 upon a direct and square-out proposition to abrogate the Chinese treaty. I read from the proceedings of the House of Representatives:

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended and that the joint resolution which I send to the desk be passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Joint resolution for the abrogation of all stipulations in existing treaties with China which permit the immigration of Chinese into the United States except for travel, education, and foreign commerce.

"Whereas the great majority of Chinese who immigrate to this country are detrimental to the welfare of American laborers; and

"Whereas they manifest no willingness or capacity or intention to assimilate with our own people and have no appreciation of our institutions; and

"Whereas the execution of the fifth and sixth articles of the treaty generally known as the Burlingame treaty endangers the peace and good understanding existing between the United States and China, and interferes with the power of Congress to regulate foreign commerce: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to immediately open correspondence with the Government of China for the purpose of securing a change or abrogation of all stipulations in existing treaties which permit the immigration of Chinese into the United States, except for travel, education, and foreign commerce."

Any one who listened to the Senator from Colorado yesterday, when he spoke about the grand difference between abrogation and violation, when he summoned his great powers to show to the American people that whilst the Republicans and General Harrison would not do a thing, would not move a hair's breadth in the way of "violation," might be led to suppose that they would do everything, travel the circuit of the earth if they could only have "abrogation" as the end of their journey. Here was a distinct proposition to change or abrogate. Now let us see what became of that resolution.

Mr. KASSON. What power to abrogate have we under the treaty?

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to offer an amendment to this resolution.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not yield for the purpose of allowing the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire that the House may consider the motion as seconded.

The SPEAKER. No second has been demanded.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Let the question be taken on seconding the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, and Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 100.

Here comes the great part of this thing. It is funny:

So the House refused to second the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask for the yeas and nays upon this proposition.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order.

The first thing we do over here after a division has been had, if any one is dissatisfied with the count, is to call for the yeas and nays, and yet the Speaker, who happened to be not JOHN G. CARLISLE or SAMUEL J. RANDALL, but John W. Keifer, a distinguished member of the Republican party, decided the motion not to be in order. Now, let us see what else happened.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Although the rules provide that the roll need not be called on seconding a motion of this kind, I make the point that this is a motion to suspend the rules, including that rule as well as all others.

The SPEAKER. But the motion is not entertained by the House.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. The rules are not yet suspended.

Mr. REED. You can not suspend the rules until you suspend them. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The vote just taken was to determine whether this proposition should be entertained by the House; and the House has refused to entertain it.

So he could not get the yeas and nays on the motion. Now, see what Mr. TOWNSHEND said was his motive for getting the yeas and nays, which was not controverted by anybody:

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My purpose was to show that but one Republican in this House has voted to sustain the motion.

The important historical fact that only one Republican in the House of Representatives voted to sustain the motion to suspend the rules by which this Republican panacea for all the ills of human life, the abrogation of this treaty, could come before the House of Representatives, was not allowed by the Republican Speaker to be put on the records or Journals of the House, and posterity and the world will not know that fact that only one Republican voted to suspend those rules, except by the statement of Mr. TOWNSHEND, which was not contradicted by anybody.

Mr. DAWES. What is the date of that proceeding?

Mr. GEORGE. May 1, 1882. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 13, part 4, page 3476.

Mr. DAWES. Is the Senator aware that the rules of the House do not permit the calling of the yeas and nays on the second of a motion to order the previous question?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir; I do not impeach the Speaker's decision. I am only stating that I read that for the purpose of showing Mr. TOWNSHEND'S statement. He wanted to get it on the record. He could not do it. His statement that only one Republican vote was for it was not contradicted.

When that time shall come, which the Senator from Massachusetts is certain will come, when all the legislation we have had or are having or are trying to have for the restriction of the Chinese will be regarded with execration, I believe was the word, at least with disfavor—I do not remember the word, but with disfavor—then I take it when that time comes this execration and this disfavor will be mainly laid upon the shoulders of the Democrats. If the Republicans in their action on this matter have been looking forward to that happy time when the prejudices of the American people against admitting these Mongolians into their country to compete with American laborers for their bread shall have passed away—I say if they are waiting for that time, then they may indeed rejoice if it shall come. They have shown the best record for that happy time that a party has ever shown upon any question. In 1862 they invited the Chinese in; in 1868 they contracted with China that they should never be kept out; in 1870, in the civil-rights law, they protected these Mongolians from discriminating taxation as against Irishmen, Germans, and Englishmen, and after we commenced, in answer to the demand of the American people, to pass legislation in Congress upon this subject, as I showed a few days ago, and up to 1886 at least, that side of the Chamber presented almost—not entirely, dissentients run up sometimes, I believe, as high as eight or nine—almost a solid vote against all measures on that subject.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is the Senator from Mississippi aware of the fact——

Mr. GEORGE. Do not ask me anything about my knowledge. I am a very ignorant man.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is he aware of the fact that the present President of the United States and the present candidate of the Democratic party for the next Presidency——

Mr. GEORGE. Who will be elected, too. Put that in. [Laughter.]

Mr. MITCHELL. Is the Senator aware that the President on the 6th day of April, 1886, sent a message over his signature to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States——

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, well, put that in an appendix to my speech.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me one moment?

Mr. GEORGE. Go on.

Mr. MITCHELL. That in that message the President recommended that Congress amend the Chinese restriction act of 1882 as amended by the act of 1884 in such a way as to enlarge the right of Chinese to come to this country, which recommendation, had it been adopted by the Congress of the United States, would have admitted into this country a very large class of Chinese who are not permitted to come into this country by the acts of 1882 and 1884.

Mr. GEORGE. Are you through with your question now?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is my question.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not aware of any such thing.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, he did.

Mr. GEORGE. I am answering now. You are through with your question. Now you can just stop. I am not aware of any such thing. If any such extraordinary thing happened as that I should think the President had been taking a little Republican liquor, or had been associating with and had been inspired by some of my Republican friends on the other side, and I do not believe he did either. In other words, I do not believe, in the first place, that the President did that thing; and in the next place——

Mr. MITCHELL. Well he did, and I hold the message in my hand.

Mr. GEORGE. Wait until I get through. I do not want to be interrupted now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should think not.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi is entitled to the floor, and declines to be further interrupted.

Mr. GEORGE. I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Oregon has from now until Christmas to use his papers.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not wish to interrupt the Senator; I only wanted to ask him a question.

Mr. GEORGE. I have a little more to say, and I do not want to waste my time in interruptions of that sort. I had a pretty good idea in my head when the Senator came in with his foolishness. I believe I was recapitulating the great efforts made by the Republican party to get the Chinese into this country, but I am so much astounded now by the revelations made by the Senator from Oregon that I have rather lost the track.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think from the sound the Senator——

Mr. GEORGE. Never mind. Keep your seat, if you please.

I believe when the Senator from Oregon interrupted me I was talking about the claim of the Republican party, set up by the Senator from Colorado, as being the early, original, eternal, and undying enemies of the Chinese getting in here, and then the original, early, and undying friends of any policy to put them out when they had got here. I thought I would recapitulate some important facts upon which I have touched in the scattering and desultory remarks I have made, and which the Senator from Nevada and others on the opposite side forced me to make under great disadvantages, when unwell. Now I will go back.

In 1862 the Republican party opend the door, inviting these fellows in. They never had been invited before. If they were here before, they were here without any national authority, without any national invitation. That was in 1862.

In 1868 they made a treaty throwing wide open the door of Chinese immigration, and bolting and fastening the door open, so that without a violation of the treaty it never could be closed again.

In 1870 they were not content with that. There was a little power, they thought, which might be left in the State governments, by discouraging Chinese immigration, discriminating between an Irishman and a Chinaman, between a German and a Chinaman, and they were so in love with these Mongolians and so much not in love with our Irish and German friends that they thought it might be that some of the States would undertake to tax one of these Oriental jewels of the Republican party, the Chinaman, a little more than they taxed another immigrant. So they put a provision in the civil rights law, not in a revenue law, but in a civil rights law, intended to put the white people of the South on an equality with the negro—I do not know whether they meant to lift us up to the negroes or to put us down, but at any rate it was to put us on an equality with our colored friends socially and every other way, not politically, but socially—they put in this axing provision, "you shall not tax a Chinaman unless you tax an Irishman or a Frenchman or somebody else to the same amount."

Well, the American people got mad at all this wickedness and folly. In 1879 the people, through their Representatives and some of their Senators here, commenced agitating about getting rid of this incubus. A bill was passed mainly by Democratic votes; it was opposed mainly by Republicans, and when the poor laboring people in this country had begun to think that they were in sight of the promised land, when like the poor pilgrim who was in the slough of despond overwhelmed by its waters, they had got a sight of the Delectable Mountains just beyond, when these poor, hard-working people began to think they were about to reach the Delectable Mountains, and at last these Mongolians would be restrained a little, would be crippled a little, would not be allowed to come in here to take their work from them, the bill passed the House, it passed the Senate, it went up to the other end of the avenue, and it was vetoed by a Republican President. That was discouraging; but the people persisted, they threatened, they were mad.

Then in 1882, three years later, after three years more of outrage, three years more of hard competition, three years more of unrewarded and unrequited toil on account of the competition of these men, we passed another bill, mainly by Democratic votes in both Houses, as I showed the other day, and then again the poor laboring people of this country began to think that they would see daylight. That bill was sent up the avenue and it was vetoed, not by a Democrat, but by a Republican.

Then to conform our ideas to the demand of the President we passed a bill, and he at last signed it, and then, oh, then, we know the laborers felt happy then.

In 1886 they had so stirred up public sentiment, they had so organized themselves, they had so pronounced from the house-tops and everywhere else that they intended to have relief from this curse of Chinese competition, that then, indeed, they saw one after another of the stalwart opponents of restriction fall. Two or three were left as I have indicated—it may be more, not many though—to stand by what they regarded as their convictions. But the strangest thing of all this eventful story is that the muse of history, misled by Republican Senators, has got things mixed, and now when everybody is for Chinese restriction—when this has been brought about by the means I have described—it is made to appear that those who fought the good fight for the restriction and won the victory were all the time on the other side, and that the only real friends of restriction were those who all along fought against it.

Now, Mr. President, apologizing to the Senate for the desultory way in which I have discussed this question, and basing my excuse upon the statement of fact which I made when I commenced, I will surrender the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 5700) to facilitate the transportation of life-saving and light-house supplies at Hog Island, Virginia;

A bill (H. R. 8855) for the establishment of a light-ship with a steam fog-signal at Sandy Hook, New York Harbor;

A bill (H. R. 1239) to extend the jurisdiction of the Light-House Board to the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers, California;

A bill (H. R. 5716) for establishing a light at the mouth of Otter Creek, Lake Champlain;

A bill (H. R. 1641) for the erection of a light-house at or near a point about midway between Barnegat and Navesink lights, in the State of New Jersey; and

A bill (H. R. 1249) for establishing a light-house and fog-signal on Roe Island, Suisun Bay, California.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the respective conferences on the Senate amendments to the foregoing bills asked by the Senate, and had appointed Mr. CRISP, Mr. ANDERSON, and Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE of Virginia managers at the conferences on the part of the House.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill H. R. 11336, a supplement to an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved the 6th day of May, 1882, having been read three times, the question is, Shall the bill pass? The yeas and nays having been ordered, Senators in the affirmative will answer "yea."

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PASCO (when Mr. FAULKNER'S name was called). I was requested to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If the Senator from West Virginia were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL (when Mr. GRAY'S name was called). The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. CULLOM. I was not aware that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] was away. We have a general pair, and if he is not here I shall withdraw my vote.

Mr. WALTHALL. I merely called attention to the pair. If the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM. Then I shall let my vote stand.

Mr. HISCOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. I suppose if he were present he would vote "yea." Therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was called). My colleague [Mr. JONES] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], as the Senator from New York has stated. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his name was called). I do not know but that I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. We were paired yesterday afternoon, and I do not know whether he intended the pair to stand over to-day or not.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE] would vote "yea," if he were present.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then I shall vote "yea."

Mr. SAWYER. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE] told me to-day that he would vote "yea."

Mr. MCPHERSON. I vote "yea."

Mr. PUGH (when Mr. MORGAN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. MORGAN] is necessarily absent from the Senate, and is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. Presuming that if he were here he would vote "yea," I shall vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. I ask his colleague [Mr. CULLOM] if he knows how the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] would vote?

Mr. CULLOM. I think he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. PASCO. Then I shall record my vote "yea," with that understanding.

Mr. PLUMB (when Mr. QUAY'S name was called). Some one announced a moment ago on the other side of the Chamber a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. I wish to say from my own personal knowledge on the subject that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] would vote "yea" on this bill, and therefore whoever is paired with him will be at perfect liberty to vote the same way.

Mr. PASCO. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], who is necessarily absent. I announced that the Senator from West Virginia would vote "yea," if he were present.

Mr. DAVIS (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], but I am assured that he would vote "yea," if he were present, and therefore I shall vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM (when Mr. VANCE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], but I advised the Senator from Michigan, knowing that my colleague would vote "yea," that he could vote "yea," and he so voted. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea." I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. BECK] is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], neither of them being present. My colleague would vote "yea," if he were present and not paired.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to inform the Senator from Kentucky that my colleague [Mr. MANDERSON] would vote "yea," if he were here.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I shall ask leave to have my vote recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the affirmative). My colleague [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa] is necessarily absent to-day, and is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I leave it with his colleagues to say what I shall do respecting the pair.

Mr. COCKRELL. The senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] would vote "yea," if he were present.

Mr. ALLISON. I will allow my vote to stand unless some Senator thinks I ought to observe my pair.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it stand. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I leave it to his colleague to say whether the pair shall be observed.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know how my colleague would vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have voted "yea." I will withdraw my vote if the Senator says so. I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri withdraws his vote.

Mr. HISCOCK. Did I understand some Senator to announce that he was paired with my colleague [Mr. EVARTS]?

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] is usually paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The announcement of the pair was made.

Mr. PUGH. My colleague [Mr. MORGAN] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Both Senators are absent.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have no doubt that my colleague [Mr. EVARTS] would vote "yea," if he were here.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. BOWEN] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL]. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. PUGH. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] requested me to announce his pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. The Senator from West Virginia would vote "yea," if he were present.

Mr. BATE. My colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is necessarily absent, and is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. BLODGETT. I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. I understand that he would vote "yea," if he were present.

Mr. BLAIR. My colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] would vote "yea," if present.

Mr. BLODGETT. Then I vote "yea."

Mr. BLAIR. I will simply say that my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] is necessarily absent, and, as has been stated, if present he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 0; as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, the Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB and Mr. COCKRELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. Is it in order to move an adjournment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order.

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to me, though I do not care to make the motion——

Mr. COCKRELL. I rose for that purpose myself.

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to me that perhaps we should not lose any time by letting this matter go over until to-morrow morning when there will no doubt be a quorum present. Still, I do not make a motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

Mr. BROWN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, September 6, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, September 5, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. J. H. CUTHBERT, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MISSOULA RESERVATION, MONTANA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, with accompanying papers, recommending legislation to secure for military purposes certain lands within the limits of the Missoula reservation, Montana; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS DISMISSED UNDER BOWMAN ACT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a list of war claims under the Bowman act dismissed for failure of proof of loyalty; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

ESTABLISHMENT OF LIGHT-SHIPS AND LIGHT-HOUSES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5716) for establishing a light at the mouth of Otter Creek, Lake Champlain.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, this is one of several bills that are on the Speaker's table which have been amended by the Senate by inserting in the House bills the appropriation of the money for the erection of the light-house or the establishment of the light-ship, as the case may be. Under the rules of the House the Committee on Commerce has no authority to make appropriations for such purpose. The Senate ask a conference with the House on the amendments to these several bills; and I ask unanimous consent that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference asked.

Mr. ADAMS. Let me ask the gentleman what difference there is between the request in this case and a somewhat similar request a few days ago, to which objection was then made? The gentleman is aware of the fact that I have been strenuous in my desire that in some way on all such questions there should be an expression of sentiment on the part of the House, although whenever a good reason has been given I have withdrawn any objection to such requests.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman perhaps did not hear my statement. Under the rules of the House the Committee on Commerce does not incorporate in any of their bills a provision appropriating the money for the work.

Mr. ADAMS. I am aware of that.

Mr. CRISP. The cases to which I now refer are House bills providing for the establishment of light-ships or the erection of light-houses in some half dozen different localities, which are on the Speaker's table.

Mr. ADAMS. The rule is the same in regard to them. The gentleman asked, if I understand it, unanimous consent, a few days ago, that the House should take action upon these bills without reference to the committee at all.

Mr. CRISP. No, sir; they are different bills.

Mr. ADAMS. The bills are of the same character.

Mr. CRISP. They are of the same general character. In each case the Senate amendment appropriates the money. My request is that the House non-concur in these amendments and agree to the conference, in order that we may make an effort at least to enforce the rules of the House in this respect.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The same order was made with reference to the following bills, namely:

A bill (H. R. 1239) to extend the jurisdiction of the Light-House Board to the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers, California;

A bill (H. R. 1641) for the erection of a light-house at or near a point about midway between Barnegat and Navesink lights, in the State of New Jersey;

A bill (H. R. 1249) for establishing a light-house and fog-signal on Roe Island, Suisun Bay, California;

A bill (H. R. 5700) to facilitate the transportation of life-saving and light-house supplies at Hog Island, Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. 8855) for the establishment of a light-ship with a steam fog-signal at Sandy Hook, New York Harbor.

BONDS OF DISBURSING OFFICERS, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 8873) in relation to the bonds of disbursing or other officers and the monthly payments of the Army; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NICHOLAS J. BIGLEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 3074) for the relief of Nicholas J. Bigley; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

RETURN OF BILLS TO THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the request of the Senate for the return of the bill (S. 3086) granting a pension to Victor, Gertrude, Margaret, and Helen, minor children of Lieut. George L. McGuire; and the bill (S. 3087) granting a pension to Mary A. Pfeiffer.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this request will be agreed to, and the Clerk will be directed to return the bills to the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PHELAN, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WHITTHORNE, for ten days.

To Mr. WARNER, for three days from September 5.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, asks leave of absence for three weeks, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has also received a letter from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GAINES] asking that his leave of absence be extended until the 20th instant, on account of serious sickness in his family. Without objection this leave will be granted.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (S. 2871) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah J. Martin;

A bill (S. 3035) to grant a pension to William Thields;

A bill (S. 3118) for the relief of Mathew O. Regan;

A bill (S. 3178) to remove the political disabilities of William L. Bradford;

A bill (S. 3364) to provide for an American register for the steamer Saginaw, of New York;

A bill (S. 2371) granting a pension to Jacob Fitner; and

A bill (S. 2716) granting a pension to Carl M. Schwantes.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I am directed to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, together with the Senate amendments thereto, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

They recommend non-concurrence in all of the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this report be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole at the present time; that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate thereon.

There being no objection, the request was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. SAYERS, Mr. FORNEY, and Mr. BUTTERWORTH as managers on the part of the House at said conference.

ALLEGED IRREGULARITY IN LIBRARY BUILDING CONTRACTS.

Mr. STAHLNECKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question, having discovered this morning upon my arrival at the House of Representatives the following article in the New York World, which I send to the Clerk's desk to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A CONGRESSMAN TO BE ACCUSED.

[Special to the World.]

WASHINGTON, September 4.

Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, to-day offered a resolution in the House directing the special committee investigating the construction of the new Library building to inquire whether any member of the House has used improper means to influence J. L. Smithmeyer, the architect, in the selection, acceptance, or approval of inferior or improper material to be used in the construction of the building. Mr. KELLEY refused to name the member his resolution would probably hit, but when the time came for testimony the name and evidence would be forthcoming. During the discussion it was intimated that the gentleman accused might be a member of the special Library committee. The resolution was therefore amended by providing for a new committee, and then adopted.

The Post says: "It is understood that the resolution is directed against Representative STAHLNECKER, of New York, who is now at Atlantic City, but who will return to-morrow."

Mr. STAHLNECKER. If this resolution (and I commence in the subjunctive mood) aims at me, I most emphatically pronounce the statement therein contained as false in every particular. I am not in that frame of mind to answer the base insinuations contained in this article at present, as I would not trust myself to do so under the aggravating circumstances surrounding me, and with my present information as to the meaning of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I have a reputation that I feel is well guarded at home, and I believe that here I have the confidence of my peers. I have certainly no knowledge why this article should have been printed or this resolution offered. This move may have been made to divert attention from an investigation now in progress of the new Library building on the question of the architect's plans and the cost of the building, and of which investigating committee I am a member. It may have been on that account. If so I certainly must say that it is a very unwarrantable and inexcusable movement on the part of its propagators. I have never in the least degree failed to practice and adhere to the principles of honor that were taught me in my childhood. I demand from this House a speedy and most searching investigation of the charges made and insinuated in the resolution offered by the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], and I will be perfectly willing to abide by its result, feeling confident that such investigation, regardless of party, sectional, or personal feeling, will disclose the fact that the alleged charge is absolutely without foundation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

LABORATORY BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9083) to erect a suitable laboratory building in Washington, D. C., and to have it considered in the House at this time.

I ask that the bill and the report be read, so that the House may understand the importance of this bill at this time.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill to erect a suitable laboratory building in Washington, D. C.

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of enabling the Commissioner of Agriculture to erect, on public reservation numbered 2, in the city of Washington, a suitable laboratory building, to be constructed of brick and to be fire-proof, for the scientific purposes of the Department of Agriculture, the same to be expended on plans to be made by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury and approved by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. ROGERS. Before I yield for its consideration I want to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] why this bill should take the construction of this building from under the control of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury and put it under the control of the Commissioner of Agriculture?

Mr. HATCH. I think the gentleman is mistaken, for there is no such provision.

Mr. ROGERS. The Architect is to make the plans and specifications, which are to be approved by the Commissioner, but the building is to be constructed under the control of the Commissioner of Agriculture. It occurs to me as extraordinary to take the construction of a public building from under the charge of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury and to put it under the control of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HATCH. That is exactly the same provision that is made in regard to all public buildings of the different Departments within this District. Now, the importance of this building is this——

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not understood to be before the House.

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair understood the gentleman from Missouri desires to make a statement.

Mr. HATCH. As stated in the report, the chemical and other scientific divisions of the Department of Agriculture are located in the basement of the building, and all their experiments are conducted in the basement of a building occupied by the employés of the Department. There are a very large number of them, and it is not only dangerous but it has been condemned from time to time by the Commissioner and other officers of the Department as exceedingly unhealthful to the employés in the building. This is a matter that has been under consideration for a long time, and there has been no question as to the necessity and importance of it. I hope there will be no objection to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROGERS. Before I withdraw my right to object I wish to say that this simply involves a matter of correct business principles. I have not noticed the construction of any of the buildings for the various Departments of the Government heretofore, but unquestionably this bill provides that the plans, etc., shall be made by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and that they shall be approved by the Commissioner of Agriculture. To that I have no sort of objection; but the expenditure of public money for the construction of this building, involving the letting of contracts and the control and management of it, is taken from under the control of the Treasury Department, where it properly belongs, and it is put under the control of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. HATCH. Let me suggest to my friend that I will make an amendment adding the Secretary of the Treasury to the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not see why it should be taken from the control of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HATCH. I do not think the Secretary of the Treasury would like to have this duty added to him.

Mr. ROGERS. Whether he would or not, it should be made his duty.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Has unanimous consent been given for the consideration of this bill?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. KILGORE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. DIBBLE. I would ask the gentleman from Texas to withdraw the objection. It is a very important bill for the Department, and there is nothing objectionable about it.

Mr. HATCH. I have made my statement, and gentlemen objecting to the consideration of such a bill as this can take the responsibility for it. I am not going to make an appeal to any one to withdraw his objection.

SUPPRESSION OF INFECTION IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. FORNEY, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported Senate joint resolution 102, appropriating $200,000 to suppress infection in the interstate commerce of the United States; which was referred to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. McCREARY. I move to dispense with the call of committees for reports, and that unanimous consent be given that members having reports to submit shall file them with the Clerk for reference.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

BRIDGE ACROSS COOSA RIVER, ALABAMA.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11338) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Coosa River at Gadsden, in the State of Alabama; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HERMAN LIEBMANN.

Mr. TAULBEE, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7098) for the relief of Herman Liebmann; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. OATES offered the following concurrent resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on Thursday, the 20th day of September, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills begins at thirty-one minutes past 12 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on the Judiciary. That committee has a bill pending before the House, the title of which the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1873) to limit the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts of the United States.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of the consideration hour yesterday there were two amendments pending reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. I desire now to submit another amendment, which I ask to have read and considered as pending.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill the following:

"Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to affect suits pending in the courts of the United States at the time this act shall take effect."

Mr. CULBERSON. I now ask that the Clerk be directed to read the bill again.

The bill was again read, with the pending amendments.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, the effect of this measure, should it become a law, may be stated in very few words.

I propose now to make such a statement, reserving the privilege, in reply, to answer any objection to the bill that may be offered, if deemed necessary.

The law of citizenship of corporations has not escaped mutation from conflicting decisions of the courts.

It is conceded now, however, that it is definitely settled by the law as interpreted by the Supreme Court that a corporation organized under the laws of a State is a citizen of such State for all judicial purposes.

It follows that such a corporation, in a proper case, may sue in the courts of the United States located in any other State, or if sued in a State court may remove the cause to a circuit court of the United States, provided the amount involved in the controversy is within the jurisdiction of the court.

Congress having vested in the circuit courts of the United States jurisdiction over controversies between citizens of different States when the amount in controversy is within the limits prescribed by law, corporations avail themselves of the right to sue in the courts of the United States as citizens.

This bill does not propose to interfere with the citizenship of corporations or in any manner to change the law fixing their status as citizens; but the object of the bill, and such is its sole purpose, is to withdraw from the courts of the United States jurisdiction over controversies arising between a corporation and a citizen of a State other than that in which the corporation was organized, in which such corporation may be carrying on business authorized by its charter at the time the cause of action accrued.

The legal operation of the proposition contained in the bill may be illustrated, as follows:

A corporation organized under the laws of Massachusetts may open an office and conduct its business in the State of Iowa, under a license granted by that State or under the comity existing between the States. If a controversy arises between such a corporation and a citizen of Iowa, and the amount involved is within the jurisdiction of a circuit court of the United States, such corporation may under existing law sue the citizen of Iowa in such court. The corporation organized in Massachusetts being a citizen of that State, although domiciled and conducting its business in Iowa, may properly under the law as now settled bring such a suit.

If this bill should become law such a suit could not be maintained in the courts of the United States. The corporation would be remitted to the courts of the State.

The proposition to change existing law in this regard is not inspired by any feeling of hostility to corporations, but rests on the doctrine of equal and exact justice to the corporation and citizen.

If a corporation avails itself of the license of a State other than that in which it is organized to conduct its business within such State, it should not be entitled to greater privileges than the citizens with whom it dwells and deals.

There is no reason why such corporations should be clothed as now with the right to drag the citizen from his home to distant and expensive tribunals.

Our observation shows that this power or authority under the law is often employed to vex, harass, and oppress the citizen litigant for the purpose of extorting compliance with unconscionable demands upon the part of corporations, or compelling the citizen to surrender just claims rather than litigate under such circumstances.

There is another object in the passage of this bill which I think should commend it to the favorable consideration of Congress.

We are all advised of the immense amount of business pending in the Supreme Court of the United States. This does not arise from a want of industry upon the part of the judges of that court.

The flow of business into that tribunal under existing law is so great that it is simply impossible for the court to dispose of it with any greater dispatch.

It is well understood, Mr. Speaker, that it requires about three years ordinarily after a cause is filed to reach a trial of a case on the docket. This delay, unavoidable, it is true, results oftentimes in an absolute denial of justice.

What remedy ought to be applied to change this condition is a question of great importance to the country. The bill now under consideration will contribute largely to the reduction of business in that court.

It has been estimated that one-third of the business now upon the docket of the Supreme Court arises out of controversies between corporations and citizens of States in which corporations are conducting their business under license or comity.

By the passage of this bill, therefore, two objects, worthy of our attention, and of great interest to the country, will be attained, namely: Corporations doing business in States, other than those in which they were organized, will be placed on the same plane with the citizens with whom they deal, and the Supreme Court will be largely relieved of the burden of an overcrowded docket.

The limited time allotted to the committee does not permit me to extend my remarks further. Other gentlemen desire to submit remarks upon the bill, and I desire, as far as possible, to accommodate them by yielding such time as I am permitted to do before the hour expires.

But in anticipation of an objection to this measure upon the ground of unconstitutionality, I beg to submit very briefly that the inferior courts of the United States do not derive their jurisdiction directly from the Constitution but from the laws of Congress.

Congress creates inferior courts and vests in them such jurisdiction within the judicial power of the United States as it may deem proper.

On this proposition I submit the following authority:

In the case of Cary vs. Curtis (3 Howard, page 245), the Supreme Court held:

Secondly, in the doctrine so often ruled in this court, that the judicial power of the United States, although it has its origin in the Constitution, is (except in enumerated instances, applicable exclusively to this court) dependent for its distribution and organization, and for the modes of its exercise, entirely upon the action of Congress, who possess the sole power of creating the tribunals (inferior to the Supreme Court) for the exercise of the judicial power, and of investing them with jurisdiction either limited, concurrent, or exclusive, and of withholding jurisdiction from them in the exact degrees and character which to Congress may seem proper for the public good. To deny this position would be to elevate the judicial over the legislative branch of the Government and to give to the former powers limited by its own discretion merely. It follows, then, that the courts created by statute must look to the statute as the warrant for their authority; certainly they can not go beyond the statute and assert an authority with which they may not be invested by it, or which may be clearly denied to them. This argument is in no wise impaired by admitting that the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. Perfectly consistent with such an admission is the truth that the organization of the judical power, the definition and distribution of the subjects of jurisdiction in the Federal tribunals, and the modes of their action and authority have been, and of right must be, the work of the legislature. The existence of the judicial act itself, with its several supplements, furnishes proof unanswerable on this point. The courts of the United States are all limited in their nature and constitution, and have not the powers inherent in courts existing by prescription or by the common law.

In the case of Sheldon vs. Sill (8 Howard, page 441) the court decided as follows:

The only question which it will be necessary to notice in this case is whether the circuit court had jurisdiction. Sill, the complainant below, a citizen of New York, filed his bill in the circuit court of the United States for Michigan against Sheldon, claiming to recover the amount of a bond and mortgage which had been assigned to him by Hastings, the president of the Bank of Michigan. Sheldon in his answer, among other things, pleaded that the bond and mortgage in controversy, having been originally given by a citizen of Michigan to another citizen of the same State, and the complainant being assignee of them, the circuit court had no jurisdiction. The eleventh section of the judiciary act, which defines the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, restrains them from taking "cognizance of any suit to cover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the contents, if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange." The third article of the Constitution declares that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." The second section of the same article enumerates the cases and controversies of which the judicial power shall have cognizance, and, among others, it specifies "controversies between citizens of different States." It has been alleged that this restriction of the judiciary act with regard to assignees of choses in action is in conflict with this provision of the Constitution, and therefore void. It must be admitted that if the Constitution had ordained and established the inferior courts and distributed to them their respective powers they could not be restricted or divested by Congress; but as it has made no such distribution, one of two consequences must result—either that each inferior court created by Congress must exercise all the judicial powers not given to the Supreme Court, or that Congress, having the power to establish the courts, must define their respective jurisdictions. The first of these inferences has never been asserted and could not be defended with any show of reason; and if not, the latter would seem to follow as a necessary consequence; and it would seem to follow also that, having a right to prescribe, Congress may withhold from any court of its creation jurisdiction of any of the enumerated controversies. Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers. No one of them can assert a just claim to jurisdiction exclusively conferred on another or withheld from all. The Constitution has defined the limits of the judicial power of the United States, but has not prescribed how much of it shall be exercised by the circuit court; consequently the statute which does prescribe the limits of their jurisdiction can not be in conflict with the Constitution unless it confers powers not enumerated therein. Such has been the doctrine held by this court since its first establishment. To enumerate all the cases in which it has been either directly advanced or tacitly assumed would be tedious and unnecessary. In the case of Turner vs. Bank of North America (4 Dallas, 10) it was contended, as in this case, that, as it was a controversy between citizens of different States, the Constitution gave the plaintiff a right to sue in the circuit court notwithstanding he was an assignee within the restriction of the eleventh section of the judiciary act. But the court said: "The political truth is that the disposal of the judicial power (except in a few specified instances) belongs to Congress; and Congress is not bound to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to every subject in every form which the Constitution might warrant." This decision was made in 1799. Since that time the same doctrine has been frequently asserted by this court, as may be seen in McIntyre vs. Wood, 7 Cranch, 506; Kendall vs. United States, 12 Peters, 616; Cary vs. Curtis, 3 Howard, 245.

In the case of Turner vs. The Bank of North America (4 Dallas, page 10), Judge Chase remarked during the trial:

The notion has frequently been entertained that the Federal courts derived their judicial power immediately from the Constitution; but the political truth is that the disposal of the judicial power (except in a few specified instances) belongs to Congress. If Congress has given the power to this court we possess it, not otherwise; and if Congress has not given the power to us or any other court, it still remains at the legislative disposal. Besides, Congress is not bound, and it would perhaps be inexpedient to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to every subject, in every form which the Constitution might warrant.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I do oppose this bill; and as a member of the Judiciary Committee I prepared a minority report on it, which has been spread upon the record. In ten minutes I can not state all that I might otherwise have to say about the bill. I can not argue the question of constitutionality or the question of policy. All that I shall attempt to do is to state the question as clearly as I can and let the House pass upon it.

First, I wish to state what my understanding is of the character and effect of the bill. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee mentions an abuse. He supposes a Massachusetts corporation doing business in Iowa; and he gave us to understand that the supposed corporation maintained its principal office in Iowa, and therefore he said it was not fair that this corporation thus doing business in Iowa should have the right to sue an Iowa defendant in a United States court. But the bill is very much broader than would be indicated by that illustration. I will give an illustration of my own which I think is fair.

The bill provides that the corporation shall not sue in the United States courts if it has done any business in the State where the defendant resides at the time the cause of action accrued. Now, take the State of Massachusetts and the State of Illinois. The State of Illinois has two judicial districts, the northern and the southern. It has a great city at the north end, Chicago, and a city at the south end, Cairo. Now, suppose this Massachusetts corporation was three years ago doing business for three weeks in the city of Cairo, in the southern district. Suppose that at the same time, and without any connection with that business, a cause of action arose between the Massachusetts corporation and a citizen of Massachusetts. Suppose that the citizen of Massachusetts should afterward remove to Chicago and reside there for a term of years less than the statute of limitations upon that cause of action. The corporation going to Illinois could not, if this bill becomes a law, sue that person who had become a citizen of the State of Illinois; and the reason it could not sue him would be that years before the suit was brought the corporation was doing some business—no matter what—for some time, no matter how short—in the most distant corner of the State of Illinois.

The reasons alleged by the chairman of the committee do not apply to the bill as it actually is. I shall only have time, as I have said, to state two or three objections to the bill. One is that I doubt its constitutionality. The chairman of the committee says that he does not propose by this bill to interfere with the citizenship of corporations; yet the report itself bases its support of the bill on the following consideration and no other:

The committee believe that a corporation that pursues its business in a State or States other than that in which it was organized ought to be regarded as a citizen of such State or States for judicial purposes.

The Judiciary Committee of this House think that under those circumstances the corporation "ought to be regarded for judicial purposes" as a citizen of the foreign State; but the Supreme Court has decided in repeated cases that such corporation is in fact a citizen of the State under whose laws it is organized; and further, the Supreme Court has decided in two cases which I have under my hand that if it does business in another State than that under whose laws it is organized, it does not even acquire a residence in that State. The cases to which I refer are Insurance Company vs. Francis, 11 Wallace, 210, and Railroad Company vs. Koontz, 104 U. S. Reports, 10. I shall not have time to do more than refer to those cases.

The leading case on the subject of citizenship of a corporation in the State under whose laws it is organized seems to me to be now the case of Louisville Railroad Company vs. Letson, 2 Howard, 554; and the reason why I call this the leading case is that although the leading case was for many years a case in 5 Cranch, yet the decision of that case having been questioned, the cases were all reviewed in this case, the decision of which has been confirmed in two subsequent cases—Marshall vs. Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, 16 Howard, 314, and Drawbridge Company vs. Shepherd, 20 Howard, 233.

These cases settle the question that the corporation is a citizen of the State under whose laws it is organized; and even if we should believe that it ought to be regarded as a citizen of the other State in which it does business—if that could make it a citizen of the State, the result would simply be that it would be a citizen of two States; for no one can claim that a Massachusetts corporation, by reason of its doing business in the State of Illinois, ceases to be a Massachusetts corporation. The constitutional question which I desire only to submit to the House is, can Congress pass a law pursuant to the Constitution by which the United States courts having jurisdiction of controversies between citizens of different States, give the benefit of that jurisdiction to a certain class of citizens of a State and deny it to another class? Under the laws and Constitution of the United States all citizens of Massachusetts, for instance, have a right to sue citizens of other States in proper cases in the Federal courts. Can Congress say that one particular class of Massachusetts citizens shall have that right and other classes of Massachusetts citizens shall not have that right? If Congress can make that difference between two classes of Massachusetts citizens, then it can make a similar distinction between any other two classes of Massachusetts citizens; and I do not see what is to prevent Congress from providing that a native-born citizen of Massachusetts may have the right to sue in the Federal courts, while naturalized citizens of that State shall not have that privilege.

I can see no distinction in logic if you once admit the power of Congress to give Federal jurisdiction under that clause of the Constitution to citizens of different States generally, and then take a particular class of citizens and exempt them from the benefits of that law. That is all I desire to say on that particular point.

But now on a question of policy. A suit between a corporation and an individual is just the same in its proceedings and the principles applicable to it as if the claimant was not a corporation. The evidence is the same, the proceeding is the same, therefore this bill can not have any motive except to discourage the existence of this particular sort or non-resident citizen. I maintain that is the province of State Legislatures to say whether State corporations shall exist or not, and, to speak with all respect to the Judiciary Committee, it is an unwarrantable interference by Congress to say a bill shall be passed which will put to disadvantage that particular sort of business association known as corporations by way of discouraging the formation of them under State laws.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ADAMS. That is not all I wanted to say, but I will not ask for further time.

Mr. CULBERSON. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL].

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Speaker, under the laws of Congress, and the decisions of the Supreme Court, a corporation created by a State may bring an action in the Federal courts against the citizen of any other State. The corporation is deemed a citizen of the State granting its charter. If an action is brought in the State courts against such corporation, in any State other than the one granting such charter, such foreign corporation may, on petition, remove the action to the Federal court. In other words, a railroad company may obtain its organization in Massachusetts, and proceed at once to Wisconsin and there construct a railroad and carry on its business. So may an insurance company, created in one State, conduct its business in another State. In either case such corporation may bring suits in the Federal courts; or if sued in the State courts, may file a petition causing a removal to the Federal courts. In this way great embarrassments often attend the citizen of the State where the business is transacted. He is often subjected to great expense and taken hundreds of miles from the scene of conflict to attend the Federal court. Such practice often amounts to a denial of justice and ought to be corrected. Great prejudice exists in the States against the Federal courts because of this unnatural right extended to corporations which may have obtained their charter or organization in another State.

It seems to me reasonable to provide that if corporations see fit to conduct a business in another State that they shall have the same but no greater rights or privileges in bringing actions, or in their defense, than the citizens of that State may themselves enjoy. Usually these bodies have great wealth and power, and certainly they should ask no greater privileges than are granted to a single individual. They necessarily become local in their business, and reap the benefits of protection under the police powers and laws of the State where they are operating, and they should seek their remedies and defenses in the ordinary way, and in the tribunals furnished under the laws of the State where they are transacting such business.

In reply to the constitutional objections raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] I will remind the House that a corporation is the creature of legislation; from that source it derives all its powers and privileges. Legislative authority may restrict such powers and curtail its privileges, especially, to the limit of those enjoyed by the citizens of the State where the litigation is had.

Congress, through the judiciary act, conferred upon the courts the jurisdiction which they exercise. The same authority may withdraw or modify that jurisdiction, and especially that which pertains to bodies created by law.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, this is an important measure and should pass. I shall occupy only a moment of time. I had the honor to introduce a bill similar to this in the Forty-sixth Congress. Why should the corporations of the country be privileged above the people with whom they transact their business? Take the railroads that traverse my State, for example. The majority of the great trunk lines running through the State of Iowa were not organized under the laws of the State, and are foreign corporations. Their principal places of business are in Boston, New York, or Philadelphia perhaps. Yet they are permanently located in the State and are carrying on business with our people and expect to do so for all time to come.

Now, will any one tell why they should not be required to litigate their causes in the State courts? Are they any better than the people? Why should the people be dragged away from their homes before strange tribunals and before packed juries? Is it to insure justice? No! It is done that justice may be sacrificed. If the corporations can trust the people in business matters, they can trust the State courts in the administration of justice. This removal of causes from State courts to Federal courts by the corporations is all wrong, and this Congress should put an end to it. Let the corporations be placed upon a level with their customers, the people. Let us have one tribunal for both. This is simple justice and sound constitutional law. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. CULBERSON. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. That this bill should pass is, to my mind, clear, and I think the objections made to it in the minority report are more imaginary than real, although personally I would not object to mere detail in the provisions, so that they might cover some of these objections.

Great volumes of the business of the country is done through the medium of corporations, and doubtless they are practically a necessity, although attended by many objectionable features. It should be the aim of legislation to make these objectionable features as few as possible, and the way to do this is manifestly by attaching, as far as possible, personal attributes to the corporation—in other words, make the attending circumstances and consequences of its business transactions as near like the same between individuals as can be.

Right here is the reason that an apparently different rule should be made as to the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. It may seem paradoxical, but as a matter of fact the different rule brings the same result. I do not refer to exceptional or imaginary cases, but to business as it is actually transacted. The great bulk of the business of the country transacted between individuals is so done that controversies respecting or growing out of it are or may be settled in the local State tribunals, and there is little, if any, such business done in a way so as to be at all analogous to corporation business, like the business of railroads and insurance companies for instance, and no wrong is done by leaving the doors of the Federal courts wide open for litigation respecting this business when between citizens of different States, whereas if the same rule is applied to the business done by these corporations it necessitates in frequent or most instances the settlement of these difficulties in a court far removed from the locality of the business itself, from the residence of the individual and the place of business of the corporation, which is irksome and expensive to the individual, wholly unnecessary to the ends of justice, and very largely amounts practically to a denial of justice to the individual.

I have personally known in practice insurance companies to use this right of removal as a lever to force settlements at less than was honestly due by reason of losses under policies, and its right and exercise by railroad companies in my State is and has been in practical effect an unmitigated outrage upon persons having just claims against them, and with no necessity to the companies for any purposes of mere justice. This has, of course, been lessened somewhat since the jurisdictional amount by reason of damages claimed has been raised to $2,000.

The great trunk lines of railway crossing the State of Iowa are the Illinois Central, the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, the Chicago and Northwestern, the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, and the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, and only one of them, the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, is an Iowa corporation, and the result is that although these other companies have great interests in the State, do their business there with its citizens, and are thoroughly identified with its interests and locally all along their lines, and are only citizens of another State, in relation to this business, in an ideal sense, as is the case with most insurance companies, they have a different, an unnecessary, and a mischievous right of removal of suits from what ordinary individuals have, and for which there is no just reason or excuse, and which is used oppressively and to gain unjust advantages rather than from any necessity in obtaining justice.

I do not believe that the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway suffers the slightest injustice for not having this right, and doubt if it would even be claimed.

I have never heard but one apparently substantial reason advanced by those interested in the matter why the companies should have this right, and this is that otherwise they would have to employ local attorneys all along their lines to attend to local litigation, and at an increased expense. This is not true in fact, as is well illustrated in Iowa by the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway, but even if fully true it would afford no good argument. All saved to the companies would be vastly more than lost to the individuals on the other side, and the joint increased expense of witnesses, travel, and other incidents would make this insignificant. The argument that the greater expense, etc., to the individual should not be considered because it would be the same in litigation between individuals is fallacious from the fact that there is comparatively so little of such litigation that the question is not a practical one.

If the corporation does its business locally it should stand on the same footing as individuals of the locality in business transacted at the same place, and there is no justice in its claiming any different right.

A doubt has been suggested as to the constitutionality of this act, but it is hardly necessary to even consider it. The jurisdiction of the Federal courts in cases "between citizens of different States" is manifestly subject to legislative control and regulation, as is evidenced by the time-honored custom of fixing a jurisdictional amount of damages claimed for original jurisdiction and for removal, and even if otherwise, except in this way, this jurisdictional amount can be so placed as to answer all practical purposes.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I have not had opportunity to give this bill the careful consideration that it merits. I assume that this has been done by the Committee of the Judiciary.

I can see that this may, in some cases, work a hardship to certain corporations in the matter of forcing them to encounter local prejudice in the trial of their causes. But there is one clear way out for them so far as this difficulty goes, and that is by their so conducting their business as to avoid any such prejudice. The rule that places all litigants upon an equal footing can not be considered a harsh one. The conditions are daily changing in this rapidly growing country. To-day many States are full of the workers and representatives of corporations that do not exist under the laws of the States where they are coining money, and the rule that brings these corporations into the home courts of the people can only result in a more delicate regard for the people's rights.

It is true that in Iowa the conditions, as to the Federal courts, are better than in many of the States. We have two districts, with three divisions in each. Terms of the circuit and district courts are held at Keokuk, Des Moines, Council Bluffs, Sioux City, Fort Dodge, and Dubuque. These points are so distributed that with two terms a year in each division the people of Iowa are in better relations to the United States courts than in other States. Since the creation of two districts and six divisions we have had good Federal court facilities. But still there is every reason why, even under our favorable conditions, Iowa should have the benefit of the proposed legislation. It will strengthen the hands of the masses. It will make corporations more careful of the people's rights, and I heartily favor its passage.

Mr. CULBERSON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire simply to submit a few observations on a single point suggested by my friend and colleague upon the Judiciary Committee, Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. He seems to have a doubt as to whether or not Congress has power to withdraw this jurisdiction now vested by law in the Federal courts. The mistake, I take it, into which he has fallen occurs from the fact that he assumes the circuit courts and the district courts of the United States acquire their jurisdiction directly from the Constitution, and may exercise it without legislation by Congress. That is an error. The judicial power is limited by the Constitution; its confines are fixed by the Constitution; but the jurisdiction conferred upon the courts other than the Supreme Court originates with Congress. The power which creates the courts is here, for we both create the courts and delegate the power; and if any question is settled by the Supreme Court of the United States it is the question that they have acquired their jurisdiction from Congress by virtue of the power conferred by the Constitution upon Congress. Chief-Justice Chase said——

Mr. ADAMS. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas will not understand me as claiming that the jurisdiction of the Federal courts depends upon the Constitution only; because without legislation these courts would not exist at all.

Mr. ROGERS. That, however, is the logic of the gentleman's argument; for if Congress has power to confer jurisdiction upon the circuit courts over citizens of different States it has also power to withhold or withdraw that jurisdiction. The circuit courts acquire the jurisdiction by virtue of the act of Congress, which confers upon them jurisdiction over citizens of different States. The Supreme Court of the United States have construed the word "citizen" to embrace a corporation, and by virtue of that construction put by the courts upon the judiciary act, the Federal courts acquire jurisdiction over the corporations of the country where they are prosecuting suits against citizens of a State other than that in which they were created.

But Chief-Justice Chase in passing upon that question used this language:

> The notion has frequently been entertained that the Federal courts derive their judicial power directly from the Constitution, but the political truth is that the disposal of the judicial power (except in a few specified instances) belongs to Congress. If Congress has given the power to this court, we possess it—not otherwise; and if Congress has not given the power to us, or to any other court, it still remains at the legislative disposal. Besides, Congress is not bound, and it would perhaps be inexpedient to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to every subject in every form which the Constitution might warrant.

Just as that provision of the Constitution which enables the Congress of the United States, if it sees fit, to pass legislation for the election of members of Congress. Congress leaves it where it has been since the foundation of this Government, under the control of the State Legislatures. So in this case, if Congress had not seen fit to confer upon the circuit courts of the United States jurisdiction over controversies between citizens of different States, that power would still remain with Congress; but it has conferred it, and the power which conferred still exists to withdraw it, and that is the object of this bill as it applies to corporations doing business in States other than those in which they were created.

The effect of the bill is as my friend from Illinois suggests: It will put the corporations—foreign corporations doing business in a State—on an equality with the citizens of the State in which they are doing business; and it is but fair, equal, and right that it should be so. Whatever, therefore, may be the view of the House as to the question of expediency, about which I have no doubt, I take it that the constitutionality of the bill is placed beyond all controversy.

Mr. CULBERSON. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time allotted me I have but time to put myself on record in favor of the proposition embodied by this bill. I know not, of course, except as I reason by a process of analogy, how important this bill may be to other sections of the country; but I can safely say that in the State of Iowa, which in part I have the honor to represent, where all the great railroads with which the people have to do business, with which they come into commercial relations, are domiciled in other States, there is not a proposition pending in Congress that in one particular item will do more good or will be more acceptable to the people of that State than the proposition contained in the pending measure, confining corporations doing business in the State to the State courts.

One of the most vexatious things arising in connection with litigation in Iowa is the matter of our citizens being dragged to distant courts at great expense, which has been carried on to such an extent and in such manner as to leave our people who get into litigation with the railroads practically without their day in court. Iowa is somewhat peculiarly situated, as nearly all the great railway lines that serve her people are corporations organized under the laws of other States, having citizenship outside the State. To this is due, in good part, the bad feeling that prevails to-day in that State between the railways and people, proving to my mind that a change in the law for the removal of causes, as contemplated by this measure, will be a step in the direction of a restoration of a better understanding.

The railways in Iowa have been extortionate in their rates and charges and needlessly independent, if not insolent, when they have been criticised for their misdoings, and one of the leading reasons for this is found in their non-accountability to the people of the State for their conduct. When a farmer has had a claim against them for damage, one of their elements of strength that gave the railroads an undue advantage over their adversary was the thought of a distant United States court, where expenses were enormous, and where juries were selected by methods somewhat peculiar, and watched over in a careful way by corporate agents that was very suggestive at times in the light of the verdicts they returned.

These corporations are as permanent fixtures in the States as the farmers they serve, and where they do their business and make their money is good enough place for them to sue and be sued. It is an unmitigated, wicked libel on the farmer to say that he is so prejudiced against railway companies that the companies can not obtain justice from farmer juries. Whatever of feeling the farmer has against corporate power and corporate influence is a just feeling that will entirely be removed whenever the corporation shall conform to the principles of justice and fair dealing with their patrons.

Why should the people along the line of a road on which they depend have a feeling of hostility against it without just cause? There is no reason for it, and nothing will have a greater tendency to show the truthfulness of this assertion than such acts as tend to the equalization of these forces. Let the corporations feel that they must depend more or less on the people and that if they expect fair treatment they must themselves extend it, and the so-called prejudice they talk so much about will be a thing of the past.

As to the unconstitutional phase of the question as presented here, that is to be expected. We are always met with objection to all legislation which has for its object restraint upon corporate greed and insolence. It may be possible that there is doubt on this score but I for one am willing to resolve the doubt in favor of my constituents and let the corporations seek their remedy, if they have one, in the courts.

The passage of this measure is but an act of simple justice, long deferred, against which there should be no opposition.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, without intending to consume any more time of the House with the discussion of this matter, I ask permission to print with my remarks the authorities on which the bill is founded.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Let that permission be general to the House.

The SPEAKER. Without objection all gentlemen who desire that privilege will have leave to print on this bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. CULBERSON. I now demand the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the amendments recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary were adopted; the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and it was accordingly engrossed and read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. ADAMS. I demand a division.

The House proceeded to divide.

Before the announcement of the result of the division,

Mr. ADAMS said: I withdraw the demand for a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The demand for a division being withdrawn, the ayes have it, and the bill is passed.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MUTILATED SILVER COIN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This concludes the hour for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLAND (when the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures was reached). I call up House bill 7933, providing for the exchange of worn, defaced, clipped, punched, or otherwise mutilated silver coins of the United States of smaller denominations than one dollar, for new or unworn subsidiary silver coins, at designated places and under certain circumstances.

The bill was read, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the holder of any of the silver coins of the United States, of smaller denominations than $1, which have become defaced, punched, clipped, or otherwise mutilated, may, on presentation of the same in sums of the nominal value of $5, or any multiple thereof, at the office of the Treasurer, or any assistant treasurer, of the United States, receive an amount of new or unworn subsidiary silver coins equal to the coinage value in subsidiary silver coin of the said coins, by weight, so presented, and when so redeemed the same shall be recoined into current subsidiary coins at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BLAND. I will ask to have read a letter from the Director of the Mint, Mr. Kimball.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF THE MINT,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1888.

SIR: At the request of the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, I have the honor to submit an opinion as to the provisions of House bill 6631, "for the exchange of worn, defaced, clipped, punched or otherwise mutilated silver coins of the United States, of smaller denominations than $1, for new or unworn subsidiary silver coins, at designated places and under certain conditions."

The redemption of worn subsidiary coins at nominal value by the Treasury of the United States is not excluded from the provisions of the act of June 9, 1879 (21 Stats. L., 7). Moreover, Treasury regulations for the redemption of subsidiary silver coins specifically provide for their redemption at nominal value.

Gold and silver coins of all kinds in a mutilated state, for whose redemption by the Treasury the law fails to provide, may be deposited for recoinage at mints and assay officers at bullion value, not, however, in the case of silver coins without a loss to the depositor of the now large difference between coinage and bullion value, in addition to all other losses, such as correspond to abrasion and depletion. This difference corresponds to the seignorage which has accrued to the Government in the act of their first issue, and which indeed upon recoinage will accrue to it again. In the case of subsidiary coin there is a loss of 26.7 grains of standard silver more than in the case of a silver dollar.

Although the present bill applies alone to mutilated subsidiary coins, there seems no reason why the silver dollar should be exempted from any provision made for the redemption of mutilated silver coin of less denomination.

It seems that the present penalty imposed upon the holder of mutilated subsidiary coin, is considerably more severe than in the case of other coins.

Prima facie, indeed, it would seem to be just to provide by law for the redemption of such uncurrent coins as are now excluded from recourse to a valuation at mints and assay offices by weight at coinage value, and thus in respect to redemption to put them on an equality with all other coins whose bullion and coinage values are coincident.

Respectfully yours,

JAS. P. KIMBALL,
Director of the Mint.

Hon. CHARLES S. FAIRCHILD,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BLAND. This bill is intended to redeem the subsidiary coin at its coinage value instead of at the bullion value. In 1880, I think it was, Congress passed an act for the purpose of preventing the punching or mutilating of the subsidiary coinage, and it was done by repealing the legal-tender character of any coin so punched, so that a quarter of a dollar or a dime that might have a hole made in it for the purpose of placing it around a child's neck or for any other purpose loses its money value and could be redeemed only as bullion. I am informed by those representing the Pacific coast, especially the gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW], that a large number of these coins have been punched and some have been defaced by the Chinese; and they have a great deal of trouble with them on the street cars and in other places in making change.

Now, this bill provides that this coin may be exchanged for legal coin and recoined at the mint. Under the present law it can not be received except at its bullion value, and that would be a great loss. It is in the interest of the public that this coin should be received at its coinage value for recoinage. I demand the previous question upon the passage of the bill, unless there should be some members who wish to speak on it; and I will yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] if he desires.

Mr. MORROW. I do not think it is necessary to have any further explanation of this bill. The report from the Director of the Mint explains the necessity for it, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] has stated quite correctly the difficulty respecting this subsidiary coinage which exists in California. It is a fact, as stated by the gentleman from Missouri, that a considerable portion of our smaller coins have been defaced from time to time by the punching of holes in them, in some cases by marking the names of firms on them; and in some instances the Chinese have marked names on the coins. Now, that coin under the present law can only be received at its bullion value. It is claimed that that is a hardship on the poor people, who generally have these coins, and it is but fair that they should be redeemed at their coinage value, as provided in this bill. It will be a measure of relief to our people, a proper and reasonable thing to do, and I hope the bill will pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLAND. I ask that the original bill be laid on the table.

It was so ordered.

Mr. BLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the substitute was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CRISP (when the Committee on Commerce was reached). Mr. Speaker, there are but twelve minutes of the hour remaining——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are fifteen minutes of the hour still remaining.

Mr. CRISP. The Committee on Commerce desire to call up one or two very important bills. One is the act amendatory of the interstate-commerce law; and I ask not to be forced to go on with it now. My own preference would be to have that bill go over till to-morrow.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I would ask the gentleman to change his request and ask that his committee be passed. There may be other committees that would like to use the thirteen minutes.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think it would be just to the other committees. They might, perhaps, want the same privilege I ask.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House take a recess for ten minutes.

Mr. CRISP. Is there any objection to the request that I made that the bour be considered as closed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has heard no objection, and will now ask, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia that the hour be considered as having expired?

There was no objection.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I rise to a privileged motion.

Mr. BRUMM. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. On yesterday it was agreed that I should be recognized for the purpose of vindicating myself against charges which had been made by my colleague [Mr. SCOTT]. I have been waiting for Mr. SCOTT for some time. He has just arrived, and he wants me to agree to a continuance of this matter until to-morrow morning. He wishes to speak on the retaliation bill to-day. It would be too laborious for him to do both, and I have agreed to withhold this matter until to-morrow morning. He agrees with me that I shall be recognized, if the Speaker will do so, immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I was just going to suggest that I supposed the question as to whether or not the matter consitutes a question of privilege would come up then as it would now.

The SPEAKER. If that question is made.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It would be a question for the House to determine whether the gentleman presents a question of privilege.

Mr. BRUMM. There is no doubt in my mind of its being a matter of the highest privilege, and it was agreed yesterday that if I would consent to have this matter go over there would be no question of its being considered.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What I wanted to say as a member of the House and for the integrity of the proceedings of this body is that the House will have the right to say as to what shall come before it on to-morrow or any other day; and I think it is well to have it understood that no agreement between these parties concerned can take away that right of the House. If the gentleman has a grievance which is a privileged question, I would be the last to prevent any member from getting the full benefit of any explanation he wished to make; but I do not want the action taken either yesterday or this morning to deprive the House itself of the right, if this is to be a degeneration into a simple airing of the views that gentlemen have; and while I do not think from my knowledge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he would bring a matter of that kind up, still I think that the right of the House should be reserved to determine for itself whether it is a matter for its consideration or not at the time.

Mr. BRUMM. If there is to be any factious opposition or objection, or if there are to be technical points raised, we may as well go right on and have them raised now.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I was speaking only as an individual member of the House. I have seen cases of this kind here so often where one word brings on another, as it does in private disputes, that I thought it well to make the suggestion I have made. If there is a real question of privilege involved, of course I should not think of interposing any objection.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] yielded to me for a moment, and I now give way to him; but under existing circumstances I can insist on my right to go on with this matter to-day.

OHIO CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I call up the motion to reconsider the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] was adopted to the bill (S. 3182) making an appropriation to enable certain Executive Departments to participate in the Ohio centennial exposition.

The SPEAKER. The motion was made to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, and upon that the yeas and nays were ordered by the House.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to interfere with the gentleman from Ohio, but the special order for this hour was and is the consideration of House bill 11309, which was under consideration yesterday.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. We have already entered upon the consideration of my motion, and it has prior privilege.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is a privileged matter.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is privileged.

Mr. MCCREARY. I know it is; but can not I raise the question of consideration against it?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I have not yielded to the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. Still, the gentleman must have an opportunity at some time or other to raise the question of consideration, and this seems to be the proper time. It is always in the power of the House to determine whether it will consider a proposition or not.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The title of the bill having been read and the question stated, I supposed we had really entered upon the consideration of the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. That is the proper time to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. McCREARY. And I rose at that time.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is only a vote to be taken upon this motion to reconsider; there will be no debate. Now, it will require a vote to decide the question of consideration, and therefore no time will be saved by raising that question. I wish to state further that this exposition has already commenced, and that if there is to be any appropriation for the departments of the Government to make an exhibit at all, the matter ought to be decided at once. On several occasions I have yielded and at other times I have kept back, not wishing to interfere with the business of the House; but I feel it my duty to call up this motion at this time.

Mr. McCREARY. I have great respect for the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, and when the question was up before I voted with him; but I remember that we consumed several hours in the consideration of the matter which he now seeks to call up, and as the gentleman has the right to call up his motion to reconsider at any time, I hope that he will not this morning interrupt the progress of the bill which was under consideration yesterday. It is very important that that bill should be disposed of, and if the gentleman will refrain from interrupting its consideration it will not take long to dispose of it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. What length of time does the gentleman suppose it will take?

Mr. McCREARY. I have been trying to agree with the other side upon a limit of time, but we have not yet consummated the agreement. I would like to get through to-day and I expect that we shall do so; and, as the gentleman's motion is a privileged one, and as he had it up before and can call it up again at any time, I hope he will not insist upon it at this time. I voted with the gentleman on this question, and I very greatly dislike now to get in his way, but I feel it my duty to insist upon continuing the consideration of the bill which the House was considering yesterday.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman proposes that the bill that he has in charge shall run for awhile—I do not know how long. I want to have the vote taken on this motion to reconsider when there is a quorum present, and that is why I desire to have it taken now, because there will not be a quorum present at a later hour in the afternoon.

Mr. McCREARY. There will be a quorum present as long as this bill is under consideration. There will be a quorum here when the vote is taken upon it, and after that will be the time for the gentleman to call up his motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is, Will the House now proceed to consider the motion called up by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE]?

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has not withdrawn his proposition.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not intend to withdraw it. I feel it my duty at this time to press this motion.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now proceed to the consideration of the motion called up by the gentleman from Ohio?

The question was taken; and the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 55.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER. As no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, to save time I demand the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 61.

Several MEMBERS. No quorum.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, no quorum has voted; but before I insist upon the point I ask the gentleman from Ohio if he proposes to do more than to take a yea-and-nay vote on the motion to reconsider?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I propose to take a yea-and-nay vote on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BLAND. If the motion to reconsider is agreed to, what does the gentleman propose to do?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I then propose to take a yea-and-nay vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLAND. There are one or two amendments pending which are to be disposed of, and if the House is going to lay aside a great public measure to take up a bill which simply regulates a circus and side-show in a few of the States of the country, I shall insist upon the point of no quorum. If this House wants to stultify itself, let it do it.

The tellers resumed their places; and after further division they reported—ayes 63, noes 64.

So the motion was disagreed to.

FISHERIES.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I now call up for consideration the special order, which is House bill 11309, to empower the President to carry out the purposes of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, and will yield the floor to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS].

Mr. FORNEY. How long is this debate to run? It is necessary to pass the sundry civil appropriation bill. I do not wish to interfere with the pending bill if the time is limited, but unless it is limited I must insist upon taking up the sundry civil appropriation bill to-morrow.

Mr. BELMONT. It seems to me that it would be wise to limit the debate on this bill.

Mr. McCREARY. How much time, let me ask the gentleman from Illinois, do they wish?

Mr. HITT. Let the gentleman from Kentucky indicate how much time will be taken up by the other side of the House. A considerable number of gentlemen have asked to be heard on this side.

Mr. BELMONT. It has been suggested to me a good many members might desire to print their remarks. [Cries of "No!" on the Republican side.] I understand one gentleman has already made that request.

Mr. McCREARY. To facilitate matters I ask unanimous consent that all members who desire to print remarks in the RECORD on the subject may do so.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I object at this stage of the debate.

Mr. HITT. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that he allow the debate to proceed until the members of the committee have spoken, and then perhaps we may agree speedily upon a time to which to limit the debate. But I would be unwilling to attempt to put a limit on the debate before my associates on this side of the House have been heard.

Mr. McCREARY. All right, then. Let the debate go on until the members of the committee have been heard.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. There are one or two members who are not on that committee who would like to be heard. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] has the floor and will proceed.

Mr. FORNEY. I give notice that I shall insist upon proceeding with the sundry civil appropriation bill, according to the notice I have already given to the House.

Mr. PHELPS. The statement made yesterday by my friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] was so clear and comprehensive that but two considerations induce me to say anything. As our views are, with one unimportant difference, similar, my remarks will furnish the summary or recapitulation which he had not time to add to his great effort. And as the facts he marshaled are not familiar ones, I may add to the aggregate of human intelligence by repeating them. The power of repetition was well illustrated yesterday. I had heard the gentleman from Missouri characterize the fishery message as a good campaign document.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Well, do you not think it was?

Mr. PHELPS. I do; and the gentleman from Kentucky had also said that this message ought to be kept with the free-trade message of the President, the two being, I suppose, a kind of Siamese twins of Presidential policy.

Mr. McCREARY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him just there?

Mr. PHELPS. Certainly.

Mr. McCREARY. I know my friend will allow me to correct him.

Mr. PHELPS. I yield to a correction.

Mr. McCREARY. I did not say that this message would stand with the "free-trade" message, for I deny that the President sent to Congress any free-trade message. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from Kentucky does not deny that he said the one message should stand with the other?

Mr. McCREARY. I said that the message sent on this subject should stand with that message sent by the President at the beginning of this session of Congress. The President sent to Congress at the beginning of the session a message to reduce taxes and to relieve the burdens imposed upon the people of the country.

Mr. PHELPS. I understand, then, as I said in the beginning, as there are but two messages under consideration, that the gentleman has in mind the same two that I have, and his wish was that the two might stand before the country together. I thought, therefore, that I might possibly illustrate his wishes in that particular when I added that they ought to stand together as the Siamese twins of the Presidential policy. [Laughter.] But if they had not been repeated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] both pieces of testimony might gave been forgotten and lost.

We give the President this additional power cheerfully, and we will give him any other additional power he may ask for, but we wish that there were any more likelihood that he would use these additional powers now than there was that he would use the original powers of eighteen months ago, when we gave them to him. The powers were then thought to be ample, and they were. If the treaty stipulations are abrogated, as the President claims, they are sufficient to cut off Canada from all commercial intercourse, foreign and domestic. If they are not, the powers are still sufficient to deprive Canada of all intercolonial or interstate commerce both by sea and land. In one section of the act of March 3, 1887, the President is authorized to exclude any Canadian vessel from our harbors. This stops all communication by water. And in the other section he is authorized to deny entry to any product of the dominions or any goods that come from the dominions. This stops all communication by land.

[Public—No. 125.]

An act to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels, in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that American fishing vessels or American fishermen, visiting or being in the waters or at any ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied or abridged in the enjoyment of any rights secured to them by treaty or law, or are or then lately have unjustly vexed or harassed in the enjoyment of such rights, or subjected to unreasonable restrictions, regulations, or requirements in respect of such rights; or otherwise unjustly vexed or harassed in said waters, ports, or places; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any such fishing vessels or fishermen, having a permit under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places, in the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places, in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most favored nation, or shall be unjustly vexed or harassed in respect thereof, or otherwise be unjustly vexed or harassed therein, or shall be prevented from purchasing such supplies as may there be lawfully sold to trading vessels of the most favored nation; or whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that any other vessels of the United States, their masters or crews, so arriving at or being in such British waters or ports or places of the British dominions of North America, are or then lately have been denied any of the privileges therein accorded to the vessels, their masters or crews, of the most favored nation, or unjustly vexed or harassed in respect of the same, or unjustly vexed or harassed therein by the authorities thereof, then, and in either or all of such cases, it shall be lawful, and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of, or within the United States (with such exceptions in regard to vessels in distress, stress of weather, or needing supplies as to the President shall seem proper), whether such vessels shall have come directly from said dominions on such destined voyage or by way of some port or place in such destined voyage elsewhere; and also, to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. The President may, in his discretion, apply such proclamation to any part or to all of the foregoing-named subjects, and may revoke, qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act. Every violation of any such proclamation, or any part thereof, is hereby declared illegal, and all vessels and goods so coming or being within the waters, ports, or places of the United States contrary to such proclamation shall be forfeited to the United States; and such forfeiture shall be enforced and proceeded upon in the same manner and with the same effect as in the case of vessels or goods whose importation or coming to or being in the waters or ports of the United States contrary to law may now be enforced and proceeded upon. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act, or such proclamation of the President made in pursuance hereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Approved, March 3, 1887.

At the time these powers were granted, everybody thought them ample. They ought to be. I do not see what more there is to give. And nobody since, President or citizen, has suggested that there were not all the powers necessary to harass and coerce Canada into good behavior, until Thursday, August 23, then the President went out alone and shot the rocket of his Presidential message into the clear and peaceful air. [Laughter.] It was so clear that you could hear the Senate Chamber still echoing with the voices of the Presidential Senators urging their fellows to come and buy the rights which Canada had refused to give. It was so peaceful that, in the Democratic view at least, there was only the cheerful chatter of a market, and the only question between Canada and the United States was one of price. Holding the President's bargain in their hands, they advised the Senate to close with it. Canada would sell the right to buy supplies and reship our fish if we would give free entry to their fish and fish-oil.

The supplies we needed might be worth $50,000, and the duties remitted $600,000; but then it would be peace. Besides, until this wonderful bargain was signed our fishermen could supply and transship upon buying a license for a dollar and a half a ton, and although this to the fishermen was a modus moriendi we can call it a modus vivendi, and that, too, is peace. Is not this a fair statement of the fifteenth article of the Chamberlain treaty and of the protocol to it? The Senators pleaded, but pleaded in vain. The Senate would not buy. The Senate refused to ratify and confirm the treaty, and the President had scarcely heard the Senate's reasons before he went back upon himself, upon his Senators, upon his treaty, and adopted the Senate's view. It was, he admitted, no longer a question of the price of the goods—it was a question of the title.

The rights he proposed to buy were our rights already; they belonged to us, and instead of buying them we would take them; and the President, reversing his engine so suddenly, has no time to provide for consistency or courtesy. He urged Wednesday that the rights were Canada's, and we must buy them. He was urging Thursday that the rights were ours and we must take them. And in the haste with which he appropriated the cry of "fishermen's rights or retaliation," he forgot to turn to the Republican Senators and say, "I thank you, gentlemen, for those words." [Laughter and applause.] This conversion of the President from the opinion of the treaty, that the rights were Canada's and we must buy them, to the opinion of the message, that the rights were ours and we must take them, was instantaneous. And yet he had fought long and well for his original opinion. His opinion was that we had no right to transship our catch, and in order to maintain this opinion and to justify Canada in refusing to let us do it, he was forced to do and suffer many unpleasant things. He had first to get rid of the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871.

ARTICLE XXIX.

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been or may from time to time be specially designated by the President of the United States, and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions through the territory of the United States for export from the said ports of the United States.

It is further agreed that, for the like period, goods, wares or merchandise arriving at any of the ports of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America and destined for the United States may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the said possessions, under such rules and regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Governments of the said possessions may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without payment of duties, from the United States through the said possessions to other places in the United States, or for export from ports in the said possessions.

This was the article which gave to each country the right to transport its goods through the other's territory in bond, and it was under this article that for thirteen years our fishermen exercised the privilege of sending their fish directly home through Canada. To deprive them of this right it was necessary to cancel the article. There were two ways: one was to hold that the article was canceled by infraction when the Canadians refused to perform their duty under it; the other way was to hold that it was canceled by formal abrogation with the fisheries treaty. The first way was direct and certain. The obligations of the article were canceled by infraction, and everybody knew and acknowledged the fact. The other way was indirect and uncertain, but the President chose it. He determined to adopt the belief that it was abrogated. He found many difficulties. First of all, the Canadians did not believe it was abrogated.

They gave their reasons for refusing to transport our catch, and strangest of all, the President never told them that he believed that the article was abrogated, and I venture to assert that the first intimation that the Canadian authorities had that the President thought so was when they read his message. How could they think otherwise? If it was abrogated it ceased to be operative July 1, 1885; but everything went on as far as our side was concerned just as before, and so on their side until June, 1886. Then they told us that the privilege granted us under the article and used by us for thirteen years, to transship our fish, was withdrawn. This was a violation of the article and canceled it. But the President did not say so. He did not say that it was canceled by abrogation a year ago. He said nothing. He did not protest; he submitted; and what is worse, he continued to perform all our obligations under the article just as if it were not canceled either by abrogation or by infraction, and to perform them with increasing effusion and alacrity.

Mr. BELMONT. Will the gentleman from New Jersey yield to me for a question?

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from New Jersey will yield cheerfully for a question.

Mr. BELMONT. It is only in order——

Mr. PHELPS (interrupting). But will not yield for a speech, because the gentleman has his opportunity afterwards. I will cheerfully yield to any gentleman who desires to submit a question, but to no one who desires to interject a speech.

Mr. BELMONT. I should regret that the House should be in the least misled——

Mr. PHELPS (interrupting). That is not a question. That is stating the reason why the gentleman wants to ask a question.

Mr. BELMONT. I would ask the gentleman if he does not know that the operations of commerce of which he is speaking have been allowed and continued under legislative enactments, and that Article XXIX, whether it is violated or not, does not apply to them as they exist to-day?

Mr. PHELPS. Let me now ask the gentleman a question. If the right to send goods from the one country through the other in bond was not created and given to both sides in the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of Washington, will the gentleman from New York be good enough to refer me to the treaty and to the article wherein these rights were created and exchanged between the two countries?

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman seems to forget that there was legislation upon this subject——

Mr. PHELPS. I am not asking what I forget; I am asking the gentleman, as he stated that this right was not a right created under the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of Washington, if he will state exactly the article and the treaty wherein that right was created.

Mr. BELMONT. I say it was recognized by the twenty-ninth article, though not created by it.

Mr. PHELPS. Then, will the gentleman be good enough to state in what treaty and in what article of the treaty it was created?

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman with his usual perspicuity will undoubtedly be able to apprehend my meaning.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from New York has stated that the right existed between these countries before the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of Washington was adopted. Now, that statement is so startling, so extraordinary, it gives information at once so valuable to our State Department and to the foreign office of Great Britain and to the world that I insist he shall not beat around the bush, but shall give the country and the House the benefit of the information which he seems alone to be possessed of.

Mr. BELMONT. I do not think it necessary——

Mr. PHELPS (interrupting). I think it is absolutely necessary, because the gentleman said that this right was given somewhere else. Now, I did not know it was given anywhere else, just as your State Department does not know it is given anywhere else, as Salisbury, abroad, does not know it, as Macdonald, in Canada, does not know it; for had either known it, he would have said so. Will not the gentleman then condescend, as I yielded him the time in response to his solicitation, to explicitly state in what treaty and in what article of the treaty these important rights were given and exchanged before the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871?

Mr. BELMONT. I understand the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] has yielded to me in order to make a——

Several MEMBERS (on the Republican side). Oh, no.

Mr. BELMONT. Statement in regard to this matter for his information.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman state where the article is, and in what treaty? I was saying that the Canadians——

Mr. BELMONT. I understand the gentleman yielded to me to answer him.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman refuses to answer the question. He has his own time, and he can perhaps state then where the treaty is.

Mr. BELMONT. It is not in any treaty or article of a treaty, but in statutory provisions that founded the present commercial operations with Canada. The gentleman from New Jersey interrupted me at every opportunity that he could, and he prevented me from answering.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman refused to answer a categorical question; and because my time——

Mr. BELMONT (interrupting). I will very easily answer it in my own time.

Mr. PHELPS. You better, for my time would not be sufficient for you, nor, I fear, eternity. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

It is a painful retrospect—the catalogue of our performances during the last two years in that direction. The President, under the article which he believed to have been abrogated, which he knew to be canceled by infraction, and which was constantly and insultingly disregarded by Canada, was heaping favors on Canadian shippers by land and sea that they might compete more successfully with their American rivals. The country will read with especial pains, if the information shall ever be given it, of the special favors given to Canadian railways. They know what Canadian railways are. They are the creatures of the Canadian Government. They were built by the government for political purposes. They are maintained by government subsidies, and they are operated without any of the restrictions of the interstate-commerce act. Yet these are the railways to which the President has generously extended all the facilities of a bonded transit.

What will the people say when they learn what was done after the Canadian Government had, in June, 1886, refused to give our goods the facilities of transit even after Congress had passed the retaliation act in March, 1887? Will they believe it? On the 20th of May, 1887, the Canadian Pacific Railway was opened to Vancouver. On that very day the Secretary of the Treasury bonded the Pacific Coast Steamship Company, and in July following gave that company a permit to carry goods in bond from San Francisco to Vancouver, to be transported over the Canadian Pacific to Boston, New York, or any other harbor of the United States. That business, which was entirely American, which belonged to the American railways, might be given to this foreign railway, the President authorizes a steamship company to carry goods over the high seas, to deliver them to its Canadian rival. I know that Congress has begun to think that railways have no rights which we are bound to respect; but is there any reason why a broken treaty should be used to take from an American railway and give to a Canadian railway the business of carrying goods from San Francisco to New York?

The President, because he would not tell any one that he thought the twenty-ninth article abrogated, but would keep on executing its provisions without hint or protest or retaliation, just as if it were in force, had trouble not only with Canada but with everybody else.

The Senate, now knowing his views, committed itself against them. In the debate on passing the joint resolution of 1883 to terminate the fisheries article, the direct question was asked Senator EDMUNDS, and he answered no, and the bill was passed without a Senator disputing his answer. So did the House, for on the same occasion, when Mr. Rice, a Representative from Massachusetts, was asked the same question he made the same answer, and the bill was passed without a single Representative disputing his answer. So did the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, for it reported unanimously, February 16, 1887, a retaliation bill, in which the twenty-ninth article was referred to by name as being in force. [Applause.]

And upon proof that the privileges secured by Article XXIX are denied as to goods, wares, and merchandise.

* * * * * * *

The President may also by proclamation, etc.

So did his Secretary of State, for Mr. Bayard wrote to Senator REAGAN, of the Committee of Interstate Commerce:

Only the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington are abrogated.

But more regretable than the unfortunate position into which the President's silence forced his friends was the effect it had upon the Canadian authorities. Finding that what they knew to be an infraction of one treaty stipulation was accepted without protest, they waxed bold to disregard at their pleasure other stipulations of the treaty, and the result has been a new series of annoyances and aggressions, which seemed to be invited by the failure of the President to make manful protest and to employ the peaceful means of self-defense committed to him. But these unpleasant things are behind us. If Article XXIX was not canceled by abrogation it was by infraction, and our hands are free, if we wish them to be.

The President is now the President of the message, not the President of the treaty; he is no longer the governor-general of Canada; he is now the President of the United States. He no longer takes the Canadian view; he takes the American view of the stipulation. If now he will act—if he will do anything—we will encourage him in his new departure. We will give him everything he asks for, necessary or unnecessary. The past will be forgiven.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eleven minutes remaining.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate still further insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 11242) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, numbered 32, 33, and 35, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agrees to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes thereon, and had appointed Messrs. ALLISON, PLUMB, and GORMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendment of the House on the bill (S. 832) to provide for an additional mode of taking depositions of witnesses in causes pending in courts of the United States, and agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Messrs. COKE, EVARTS, and GEORGE as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 1073) for the relief of the Roman Catholic Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, at Chattanooga, Tenn., and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes thereon, and had appointed Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. HARRIS as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7708) to increase the pension of Annie Gibson Yates.

The message further announced that the Senate requests the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 5716) for establishing a light at the mouth of Otter Creek, Lake Champlain.

FISHERIES.

Mr. BELMONT. Ordinarily I should find it a most difficult and serious undertaking to reply to my colleagues of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS]. I have had a long experience of their ingenuity and their ability in dealing with such questions as this, and I have a respect for their opinions. But in this instance, after listening to the arguments which they have made, and remembering that in not one single sentence has either of them declared his intention to vote against the bill, my only difficulty is to believe that even those who may be politically opposed to the President of the United States should, in such a grave crisis as this, charge upon him motives inconsistent with his duty—so bravely and well performed—to guard and protect the rights of American citizens and to maintain the dignity and honor of the nation.

Why, Mr. Speaker, we ought not to be, and I am sure upon reflection we will not be, Democrats and we will not be Republicans when confronting unfriendly acts of a foreign power. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] surprised me, who had approached him in the most fair and friendly spirit in the endeavor to make a correction of a statement which I am sure the House will see is unfounded, utterly unfounded. And it is more surprising because the gentleman from New Jersey ought to be familiar with all the phases of this important subject. I deny in common with all who have looked into this question with care, and who have considered the statutes as well as the treaty of 1871, that these commercial operations or privileges originated in the twenty-ninth article. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there exist upon the statute-book laws providing for the operations of commerce between the United States and Canada; laws antedating the treaty of 1871. There is a——

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. BELMONT. I will not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PHELPS. That is scarcely reciprocity, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BELMONT. That is exactly what it is.

Mr. ROGERS. "Retaliation." [Laughter.] [Cries of "Regular order!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BELMONT. The statute of 1862 is the foundation of this series of legislation providing for the warehousing of foreign merchandise upon our territory for a certain period free of duty. Then there was an act approved by President Johnson March 14, 1866, five years before the treaty of Washington, which distinctly provides "that neither this nor any other act shall operate to prevent the transportation of bonded goods, wares, or merchandise from warehouse within three years from the date of the original importation nor their exportation in bond from the port into which they were originally imported into any other port or ports for the purpose of exportation." This was followed by still another act approved July 28, of the same year, which mentions the British provinces by name.

I did not think I should be called upon to have those statutes read, but it does seem necessary for the information of the gentleman from New Jersey, and I therefore ask the Clerk to read section 5 of the act of 1866, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, or any other port of the United States which may be specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the adjacent British provinces, or arriving at the port of Point Isabel, Texas, or any other port of the United States which may be specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destined for places in the Republic of Mexico, may be entered at the custom-house and conveyed in transit through the territory of the United States without the payment of duties, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. BELMONT. The date of that act is 1866. Now I will endeavor to remind the gentleman from New Jersey——

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman yield to me to say——

Mr. BELMONT. I can not yield. I should have gladly done so had I been met in the spirit which at the outset I intended to show to him. The gentleman from New Jersey was a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the last Congress, and he has referred to the bill which we unanimously reported at that time, and has endeavored to point out an inconsistency in the position of the committee by reason of the fact that that bill makes reference to the twenty-ninth article. In view of the existing statutes running parallel with the twenty-ninth article, which was already terminated, it is very clear that it was quite proper that these operations of commerce should be described by some phrase which could properly enter into a bill of that nature, but the language employed does not imply at all that the twenty-ninth article was then in force. It could not imply any such thing. If the House will permit, I will here insert the text of that bill, which was as follows:

That hereafter whenever the President shall be satisfied that vessels of the United States are denied, in ports or territorial waters of the British dominions in North America, rights to which such vessels are entitled by treaty or by the law of nations, or are denied the comity of treatment or the reasonable privileges usually accorded between neighboring and friendly nations, he may, in his discretion, by proclamation, prohibit from entering the ports of the United States, or from exercising such privileges therein as he may, in his discretion, by such proclamation, define, vessels owned wholly or in part by a subject of Her Britannic Majesty, and coming or arriving from any port or place in the Dominion of Canada, or in the Island of Newfoundland, whether directly or having touched at any other port, excepting such vessels shall be in distress of navigation and of needed repairs or supplies therefor, and he may also forbid the entrance or importation, either by land or water, into the United States, of any goods, wares, or merchandise from the aforesaid Dominion of Canada or Newfoundland, or any locomotive, car, or other vehicle, with any goods that may be therein contained, from the Dominion of Canada; and upon proof that the privileges secured by Article XXIX of the treaty concluded between the United States and Great Britain on the 8th day of May, 1871, are denied as to goods, wares, and merchandise arriving at the ports of British North America, the President may also, by proclamation, forbid the exercise of the like privileges as to goods, wares, and merchandise arriving in any of the ports of the United States; and any person violating or attempting to violate the provisions of any proclamation issued under this act, and any person preventing or attempting to prevent any officer of the United States from enforcing such proclamation, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be liable to a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisoned for a term not exceeding two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court; and if, on and after the date at which such proclamation takes effect, the master or other person in charge of any vessel thereby excluded from the ports of the United States shall do, in the ports, harbors, or waters of the United States, for or on account of such vessel, any act forbidden by such proclamation aforesaid, such vessel, and its rigging, tackle, furniture, and boats, and all the goods on board, shall be liable to seizure and forfeiture to the United States; and any goods, wares, or merchandise, and any car, locomotive, or other vehicle, coming into the United States, in violation of any proclamation as aforesaid, shall be seized and forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 2. That whenever, after the issuance of a proclamation under this act, the President is satisfied that the denial of rights and privileges on which his proclamation was based no longer exists, he may withdraw the proclamation, or so much thereof as he may deem proper, and reissue the same thereafter when in his judgment the same shall be necessary.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] very clearly explained to the House yesterday that the twenty-ninth article contains within it a provision for its own termination. I do not desire to weary the House with a repetition of that argument, but it seems necessary in view of the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey. The article contains a reference to its own termination in the provision that this article (Article XXIX) shall continue in force for the time mentioned in Article XXXIII. Article XXXIII is the article terminating the fisheries clauses, from No. 18 to No. 25, the time being ten years, with a notice of two years. I was myself a member of the committee in 1883, when the House gave the necessary notice, and the fishery articles, together with the articles of the treaty linked with them, were terminated at that time. I will say further that it was not necessary that the twenty-ninth article should have been named, because the thirty-second article was not named but was also then considered as terminated.

That Canada considered this article as no longer in force is obvious from the course of her officials, and much more so if we observe the character of her legislation. In referring to the bill which was the subject of controversy between the Senate and the House in the last Congress, I think it not improper for me to say that at the time of the preparation of that bill the President was consulted as to the amount of power to be vested in him, and I state to the House that the President at that time desired the same measure of authority for which he asks in the message now before us. I trust I shall observe the rules usually prevailing in both Houses as to the proceedings in either House, but it is almost impossible to properly discuss the questions presented without a reference to the action of the Senate. The Senate was unwilling to grant the power which the House and the President considered necessary to carry out the policy which we are now again endeavoring to put into effect.

I do not think it necessary to recall the points of difference which then existed. There is reason, however, to believe that obstacles which were then placed in the way of such a measure have in part at least been removed. Closer investigation has shown the wisdom and necessity of the policy inaugurated and adopted by the House, and many minds hitherto in doubt as to the power under the treaty of 1871 to withdraw certain privileges from Canadians have now become clear in the opinion that the twenty-ninth article of that treaty is no longer in force, and that such privileges can and should be withdrawn.

We in the House, during the course of the debate—many of us, at least—said it might be that the large railroad interests which undoubtedly would be affected were very sensitive about the measure. It may be so to-day, and we have yet to see the course of this bill to its conclusion. The Senate has not only placed itself in the way of the policy which the President then desired, but it has also interposed by a party vote its opposition to a fair, honorable, and advantageous treaty. Not only that, but the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate has announced that the fisheries questions, in controversy between Great Britain and the United States, are not subjects for treaty negotiation. The country, it seems to me, will apprehend that the Senate has thereby abdicated its share in the settlement of these gtave questions, and that it now rests with the House to give direction and force to the position of our Government; that it rests with the House to uphold the President in the policy which the country has so well received.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] has referred to the projected treaty of 1888 in terms of contempt, and has made the statement, which appears also in the report of the majority of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, that by the treaty there was a surrender of a vast area of fishing waters. The report of the Senate committee stated that that area amounted to 1,127 square miles. I have had a tabular statement prepared, from which it appears that the entire area amounts to 749 square miles as against 4,000 square miles claimed by Canada; and the majority of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations admit in another part of their report, in the third, fourth, and fifth of their conclusions, that the fisheries in those surrendered waters are practically worthless at the present time, though they contend that they might become profitable in the future, and should therefore not be given up. The exact areas surrendered, if the House cares for the figures, were as follows: In square miles, (1) Baie des Chaleurs, 500 miles; (2) Bay of Miramichi, 23; (3) Egmont Bay, 20; (4) St. Ann's Bay, 5; (5) Fortune Bay, 160; (6) Sir Charles Hamilton Sound, 2; (7) Barrington Bay, 2; (8) Chedabucto Bay and St. Peter's Bays, 18; (9) Mira Bay, 7; (10) Placentia Bay, 7; (11) St. Mary's Bay, 5. This is an actual area of 749 square miles , and is nearly all in two bays.

While we have much to learn, apparently, from our friends on the other side of the aisle about this treaty, we can also learn something from our enemies across the border; and I will ask the Clerk to read a statement made in the Canadian Parliament by Mr. Ellis, a prominent member of that body, on the 18th of April last.

The Clerk read as follows:

First. We have by the very act of making this treaty receded from the position maintained so long in practice, that Canada and Great Britain could impose their own interpretations upon the meaning of the treaty of 1818, thus enlarging the restrictions of that treaty. By doing this we have given the United States a precedent upon which to base new demands for the amelioration of the regulations applied to their fishing vessels, should the need arise.

Second. We have almost wholly abandoned the contention that fishing vessels are a class by themselves, and therefore not entitled to any commercial privileges.

Third. We entirely and forever abandon the 3-mile headland theory.

Fourth. We forever admit the right of United States fishermen to navigate the Straits of Canso.

Fifth. We no longer compel American fishing vessels to depart from our shores in twenty-four hours after arrival.

Sixth. We relieve them from the obnoxious operations of customs regulations enforced against them as fishing vessels, and which were specially severe, as the true intent of these laws was to regulate commercial trading only.

Seventh. We free them from harbor, pilotage, and other dues, which are sometimes inhospitably and often capriciously imposed upon them, even in cases where they sought shelter, dealing with them in these matters as commercial vessels, though denying them the rights of commercial vessels.

Eighth. We have practically abandoned the course of ordering them to depart if supposed to be hovering within our waters, and also the plan of putting an officer on board of them as a matter of course.

Ninth. We permit them, under certain circumstances, to purchase bait, to replenish outfits, to ship men, and to transfer cargoes.

Tenth. We issue to them, free of charge, permits which enable them to purchase supplies in ports of entry on all occasions, just as trading vessels, except that they may not do it for barter, and this applies both to the homeward voyage and outward voyages. This section does not name bait; but there will be no difficulty whatever of purchasing bait under it.

Eleventh. By the fourteenth article we abandon our previous contention that preparing within Canadian waters to fish is evidence of intention to actually fish within Canadian waters, and we therefore recede from the position taken by the act of 1886.

Twelfth. We have limited and defined and reduced the severe penalties imposed by that act for violation of our exclusive rights of fishing. Forfeiture of the vessel is no longer a penalty except for fishing within Canadian waters or preparing within those waters to fish therein. In all other cases $3 a ton is the highest fine which can be imposed.

Thirteenth. We have provided a summary process of law for dealing with arrested or captured vessels, instead of the old and slow process of the admiralty court.

Fourteenth. And lest the punishment of an infraction of the new treaty or that of 1818 should seem to be unjust, and to prevent the danger of giving offense to the United States, the Government of Canada can reverse the judgment of the court.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to bring into this discussion anything like an accusation of unfairness to the President and to his Secretary, but I do not think it just to the House to pass unnoticed the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey, who has said that the Canadian acts have been passed over by our Government without protest. If it will not weary the House I will ask the Clerk to read, and I hope the House will attend to the reading of, a very serious and earnest protest—such a protest as indeed calls for the action which we are endeavoring to take to-day.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman be good enough to state where, at any time, by agent or directly by himself, the President ever intimated before the 23d of August that he considered this article of the treaty canceled either by abrogation or infraction?

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman, who is so familiar with diplomatic affairs, will recognize that the statement of the Secretary of State is the statement of the President. I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Mr. Bayard to Sir L. West.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 29, 1886.

SIR: I have just received an official imprint of House of Commons bill No. 136, now pending in the Canadian Parliament, entitled "An act further to amend the act respecting fishing by foreign vessels," and am informed that it has passed the House and is now pending in the Senate.

This bill proposes the forcible search, seizure, and forfeiture of any foreign vessel within any harbor in Canada, or hovering within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors in Canada where such vessel has entered such waters for any purpose not permitted by the laws of nations, or by treaty or convention, or by any law of the United Kingdom or of Canada now in force.

I hasten to draw your attention to the wholly unwarranted proposition of the Canadian authorities, through their local agents, arbitrarily to enforce according to their own construction the provisions of any convention between the United States and Great Britain, and, by the interpolation of language not found in any such treaty, and, by interpretation not claimed or conceded by either party to such treaty, to invade and destroy the commercial rights and privileges of citizens of the United States under and by virtue of treaty stipulation with Great Britain and statutes in that behalf made and provided.

I have also been furnished with a copy of circular No. 371, purporting to be from the customs department at Ottawa, dated May 7, 1886, and to be signed by J. Johnson, commissioner of customs, assuming to execute the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concluded October 20, 1818, and printed copies of a warning, purporting to be issued by George E. Foster, minister of marine and fisheries, dated at Ottawa, March 5, 1886, of a similar tenor, although capable of unequal results in its execution.

Such proceedings I conceive to be flagrantly violative of the reciprocal commercial privileges to which citizens of the United States are lawfully entitled under statutes of Great Britain and the well-defined and publicly proclaimed authority of both countries, besides being in respect of the existing conventions between the two countries an assumption of jurisdiction entirely unwarranted and which is wholly denied by the United States.

In the interest of the maintenance of peaceful and friendly relations, I give you my earliest information on this subject, adding that I have telegraphed Mr. Phelps, our minister at London, to make earnest protest to Her Majesty's Government against such arbitrary, unlawful, unwarranted, and unfriendly action on the part of the Canadian Government and its officials, and have instructed Mr. Phelps to give notice that the Government of Great Britain will be held liable for all losses and injuries to citizens of the United States and their property caused by the unauthorized and unfriendly action of the Canadian officials to which I have referred.

I have, etc.,

T. F. BAYARD.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman from New York yield to allow the date of that letter to be read? What I wish to know is whether the date of this letter is after notice of the infraction of the article or of an intention to break it was given——

Mr. BELMONT. I fear, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PHELPS. Let us have the date. That will answer the question.

Mr. BELMONT. I fear the gentleman does not understand——

Mr. PHELPS. Is the gentleman unwilling that the date should be read?

Mr. BELMONT. I do not yield any further.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I think it in order for me to expect——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor, and declines to yield.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a question of privilege. I claim that it is the right of a member to have a public document so read that if he is giving careful attention and is not naturally deficient in hearing he shall hear what is read. I did not hear the date of this letter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state in reply to the gentleman's "question of privilege" that the gentleman from New York, in addressing the House, is entitled to send to the desk and have read in his time such document as he sees proper; and only such portions thereof as he desires to have read can be read in his time without his consent.

Mr. PHELPS. I think, if the Chair will pardon me, the date was read, but I did not catch it.

Mr. BELMONT. I think the difficulty can be easily overcome. I will read the date—

Washington, May 29, 1886.

I was proceeding to say——

Mr. PHELPS. Now, will the gentleman yield for a question which will be significant in that connection?

Mr. BELMONT. I was proceeding to say that I do not think the gentleman quite understood the nature of the protest. He seems to imagine that it has reference to certain infractions of the twenty-ninth article. It was, in fact, a protest against the proclamation by the Queen of a legislative enactment of Canada. It was an endeavor to urge upon Great Britain the importance of exercising some restraint on the Dominion.

Mr. Speaker, I think the reading of that protest is certainly a sufficient answer to the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] that no protest had been entered in regard to the infraction of our treaties and the unfriendly and unneighborly enactments of the Canadian legislature. The policy which we are endeavoring now to establish is a wise one, because it undertakes to protect the rights of our citizens. And more than that, it is an absolutely necessary one in the face of the protest which we have made. If such protests as this are not followed by action on our part, it would be notice to Great Britain and other governments that protests coming from us are mere formalities not to be followed by action.

It is well enough for those who are hostile to us, either in England or Canada, to look upon the rivalry between Democrats and Republicans in maintenance of American rights as the mere struggle of party, but it is a rivalry, Mr. Speaker, in which we can take great pride and satisfaction, a rivalry with a worthy aim in view. We know well when the moment comes to act that when a great crisis comes upon the nation party differences must be sunk in a united purpose to uphold the rights of our people and the dignity of our Government.

If I have time left, I desire to reserve it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has twenty-seven minutes.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I desire to yield thirty minutes of my time to my colleague [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, events do not stand alone. They must be judged by their relation to other facts with which they are connected in order to ascertain their true character and the causes and motives from which they have resulted. This relation is the logic of events and its recognition is the philosophy of history.

Keeping in view this principle we may possibly be able to understand the purpose of the message which the President has recently addressed to Congress. This message reeks with the spirit of retaliation. It demands additional power to that already given by Congress in order that this policy shall be made sweeping and effective.

Now I do not object to this. I have always believed in this policy toward our neighbors over our northern frontier until we could prove to them that their aggressive and unfriendly conduct was a blunder in dealing with a great people who can give blows as well as take them.

I do not think he needs the powers he asks for in addition to those conferred upon him by the act of March 3, 1887. But I would not cool his new-born zeal or thwart his late purpose of defending our interests in the manner pointed out by Congress. But I am concerned to inquire what has led to this sudden conversion. The exigency calling for the exercise of the powers he already possesses, not to speak of those he calls for, is by no means as imperative as it was when the retaliatory act was passed. The fishing season is nearly over, and there is little, if any, disturbance on the Canadian coast. What, then, has aroused the President so suddenly to the importance of retaliation?

It is known that following the revocation of the fishery articles of the treaty of 1871, a series of annoyances, aggressions, and outrages were practiced by the Canadian officials upon our fishing vessels. The commercial rights which they had enjoyed almost uninterruptedly for more than half a century by virtue of reciprocal arrangements between Great Britain and the United States were denied them. They were molested and driven away or seized when exercising their rights under the treaty of 1818. In short, a condition of commercial non-intercourse and hostility was put in practice by the Dominion Government toward a class of our vessels apparently because they dared to pursue a calling upon the high seas which the New England fishermen had prosecuted a century before the British occupation of Canada. More than two thousand of our fishing vessels had been molested and harassed in this manner. These violations of international law, comity, and treaties had been vigorously protested against by our present Secretary of State and minister at the Court of St. James, and in each case the British Government had been notified that compensation for damages would be demanded.

The object of this injurious policy on the part of the Canadian authorities, sustained by the mother Government, was of course well understood and stated by our Government in the official correspondence arising from it. It was intended to force us to abolish our customs duties upon fish and fish products in order that they might have free entrance into our markets for the products of Canadian fisheries in competition with our American fishermen. Their experience of the treaty of 1871 had proved that with their cheapness of vessels, outfit, and crews and the bounty they received they could eventually destroy our fishing industry and take possession of our market.

It was because of this state of facts that Congress passed, with substantial unanimity, the retaliatory act, which clothed the President with discretionary power to prohibit for such a period of time as he saw fit the entrance into ports or places of the United States of Canadian fishing vessels, fish, or the products of Canada.

This was the obvious method of dealing with the subject. It would teach the Canadians that their policy could not accomplish its object, and that so long as it was pursued they would be utterly shut out from our markets; that, so far from succeeding in forcing us to their position and securing the entrance of their fish free of duty, they would exclude that product by their own act from our ports and markets. It can hardly be doubted that the exercise of this power by the President for a short time would have been effectual, and would have inflicted no serious injury upon any American interest.

Then when our northern neighbors had discovered their mistake it would have been easy, either by reciprocal legislation to have secured our rights, or, if a new treaty were desirable, we could have restored the previous status, and in return demanded commercial rights and fair and liberal treatment in all respects. The President, however, preferred to negotiate a treaty, which was properly rejected by the Senate.

I shall not attempt to discuss this treaty in detail. I firmly believe, however, that if it had not been for that pressure that an executive knows how to bring in favor of a measure it would have been rejected by a two-thirds vote of the Senate.

It utterly failed to protect our fishing interests, and was in the most important respects a surrender of our ancient claims and a submission to the most arrogant British pretensions. It admitted the British headland theory, never before conceded by our Government or even insisted upon by Great Britain; and by its specific delimitations and the increase of the width across the mouths of excluded bays from 6 to 10 miles shut us off from vast areas in which we had claimed and exercised common fishing rights.

It occurs to me that among other waters the Bay of Chaleur was delimited by this treaty—a bay 70 miles in length and 20 miles or more in width—where our fishermen have sailed and fished almost from time immemorial; yes, sir, since the first mackerel was caught by the first Yankee fishermen, two hundred and fifty years ago.

I can recollect when the chief catch of the mackerel fishermen was taken in those waters, and the name of this famous bay is one of the familiar sounds of my childhood.

The Massachusetts fisherman knew these waters as he knew those of Barnstable Bay. He knew its coast line, the rise and fall of its tides, and the familiar roar and swell of its waves. He had seen year by year, month by month, day by day, upon its surface those vast schools of the most beautiful of the finny tribe, their delicate forms leaping and their blue sides glancing in the sunlight, as he merrily plied his lines or drew in his nets. Sir, the Yankee fisherman excluded from those waters would feel as the Scotch Highlander felt when driven from his native mountains by the greed of rapacious landlords.

If this treaty had been ratified, the New England fisherman would have hated the word "delimitation" as he hates the enemy of his salvation.

It left the question of the alleged infraction of this treaty to be determined by Canadian courts, and permitted harsh penalties, extending to forfeiture of vessels and cargo and supplies. These courts are prejudiced against our fishermen and the witnesses are substantially bribed by the share they would receive of the confiscated property in case of conviction.

The burden is placed upon the defendant to prove his innocence—a monstrous perversion of justice. And if the seizure should be adjudged illegal, nominal damages only can be secured. This treaty failed to secure indemnity for the numerous and wanton injuries and outrages committed upon our fishermen, and for which Secretary Bayard had declared compensation would be demanded.

It sacrificed the commercial rights which our fishing vessels had exercised almost uninterruptedly for more than fifty years, and for which we had rendered a full equivalent by the concession of similar privileges which this treaty did not disturb or impair. Instead of these full commercial rights, which were and still are conceded to Canadian fishing vessels in our ports, it only secured what no civilized government could deny—the privilege of purchasing provisions and supplies on the homeward voyage if needed, and these not to be obtained by barter. In other words, it was not to be in any sense a commercial right, but a privilege to be exercised in the most expensive manner to avert actual want or possibly starvation on the homeward trip.

It could not be and was not intended to be of the slightest use in prosecuting the business of the vessel. If the provisions should be spoiled or run short while engaged in fishing, except by casualty, not an ounce of bread or meat could be purchased in all Her Majesty's North American dominions, unless the vessel should agree to leave the fishing grounds and return home, abandoning of course her season's fishing.

What a concession from one civilized nation to another—kindred nations, as we are so fond of saying. Then, under stress of weather or other casualty, we might unload, reload, transship, or sell, subject to customs laws or regulations, all fish on board, when such proceedings were "made necessary as incidental to repairs, and may replenish outfits, provisions, and supplies damaged or lost by disaster."

The concession of those privileges only when necessary to save vessel or cargo was a simple act of humanity which needed no treaty stipulations to enforce and which no government could decline to grant without disgrace. But I wish to call the attention of the House to a most serious surrender of our interests contained in this article.

Under the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of 1871 we secured the right to convey in bond goods, wares, or merchandise arriving in any of the ports of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America through said possessions without the payment of duties.

The representative of the Administration and chief negotiator on our side of the rejected treaty declares that this article is not abrogated, and therefore agreed to Article XI of the Bayard treaty under the conviction that Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 was then in existence. Now, it is clear that by express implication this article repeals the right to convey fish in bond secured by the former treaty, and only preserved the right to transship in case of casualty or disaster.

Two years ago the British Government notified us that this right which we had enjoyed under the treaty of 1871 would no longer be conceded, and this article of the treaty of 1888 virtually admitted the propriety of the refusal of the British Government to obey its treaty stipulations and gave away the most important right which our fishermen possessed under it. The President now says that—

> In the year 1886 notice was received by the representatives of our Government that our fishermen would no longer be allowed to ship their fish in bond and free of duty through Canadian territory to this country; and ever since that time such shipment has been denied.
> The privilege of such shipment, which had been extended to our fishermen, was a most important one, allowing them to spend the time upon the fishing-grounds which would otherwise be devoted to a voyage home with their catch, and doubling their opportunities for profitably prosecuting their vocation.
> In forbidding the transit of the catch of our fishermen over their territory in bond and free of duty the Canadian authorities deprived us of the only facility dependent upon their concession, and for which we could supply no substitute.
> The value to the Dominion of Canada of the privilege of transit for their exports and imports across our territory, and to and from our ports, though great in every aspect, will be better appreciated when it is remembered that, for a considerable portion of each year, the St. Lawrence River, which constitutes the direct avenue of foreign commerce leading to Canada, is closed by ice.
> During the last six years the imports and exports of British Canadian provinces carried across our territory, under the privileges granted by our laws, amounted in value to about $270,000,000, nearly all of which were goods dutiable under our tariff laws, by far the larger part of this traffic consisting of exchanges of goods between Great Britain and her American provinces brought to and carried from our ports in their own vessels.

The President is now of the opinion that the article of the treaty of 1871 under discussion was revoked, but this probably was not his opinion when the treaty of 1888 was negotiated, as he and the Secretary would hardly have entertained opposite views on a matter of such importance.

But suppose the twenty-ninth article were revoked, the reciprocal legislation which preceded it was in force, and, as the President has shown, was of much more importance to Canada than to us. Why, then, did he assent to a treaty which justified the Canadian Government in refusing to convey fish in bond through its territory, and fortified its position that fish was not included in the treaty stipulations or in the preceding legislation? I say that the President in that treaty yielded American interests, up to that moment inflexibly maintained by treaty and legislation, to Canadian interests, and would have left our fishermen helpless, notwithstanding the enormous advantages of transit given to Canada. Could not these advantages have been used in securing something for our fishing interests in the treaty instead of flourishing their threatened withdrawal in her face since its defeat?

The President has been aware for two years of the refusal of Canada to allow the transit of fish in bond destined for some point in this country. Has he made proper remonstrances against her refusal to fulfill her reciprocal obligations? If so Congress has not been informed of the fact, and if he has made representations concerning such important interests, reflecting upon the good faith of the British authorities, it is yet to appear.

But if conclusive evidence were wanting in the eleventh article, for which the President is responsible, that we surrendered the privilege of transshipment of fish in bond through Canadian territory, it is found in the fifteenth article, where that privilege is accorded with certain commercial privileges, provided the United States shall admit free of duty the products of Canadian fisheries. So that the two articles show beyond question that this valuable privilege was distinctly surrendered and the British Government could ever afterwards insist that it should be excluded from any reciprocal transit arrangements, although the President now admits that this was the only important concession that the Canadians could make to us.

I will insert in my remarks the views respecting the character of this treaty of one of the most eminent members of the Democratic party, who is, perhaps, better informed upon the subject of our fisheries relations than any American now living.

The letter of Mr. Woodbury is as follows:

To the Editor of the Sun:

SIR: The Chamberlain treaty is now before the Senate. It surrenders everything the United States have contended for since 1838, when the dispute on the 3-mile limit began, contentions which the British authorities have assented to or temporized about as often as pressed, so that really in no entire year since then have they insisted on enforcing their headland theory.

The commercial rights of the United States under the agreements of 1830 were utterly abandoned by Mr. Bayard after much previous insistance on their obligation.

The rights of common humanity toward our vessels in distress, accorded everywhere except on the Canadian coast, are hereafter to be allowed only upon the condition that the United States shall change its present registry laws by repealing them, and enacting such new ones as are acceptable to the British Government before going into effect. This of course leaves the humanity of Canada to vessels of the United States in distress withheld until the United States shall pay the consideration by repealing its laws and making such new ones.

Commercial intercourse by our fishing vessels is disallowed, but they may be permitted to buy a narrow line of supplies, whose extent would not exceed $50,000 a year, when the United States shall have repealed existing duties, now over $611,000 a year, on Canadian fish and oil, and made them free in our markets.

This is the substance of the treaty, all losses to the United States both in honor and profit. General Jackson and Mr. McLane, Van Buren and Forsyth, Stevenson and Everett, Webster, Rush, Grant, Evarts, and even Bayard and Phelps for two of their official years, are buried beneath this treaty and their memories dishonored by its retreat from their patriotic contentions for American rights.

Cavilers have said the treaty of 1818 was wrung from our weakness, but this treaty, made in the hour of our strength, surrenders what that never did—our markets; and it doubles the waters from which it requires we shall be forever excluded.

The consequence of adopting this treaty would be the destruction of the fishery under the American flag, the paralysis of our hope of naval power, and a British monopoly of our markets, aggrandizing its dangerous naval power. Let the treaty be rejected.

CHARLES LEVI WOODBURY.

BOSTON, May 4, 1888.

Sir, that treaty failed to protect American interests or to maintain American honor. It surrendered the New England fisherman naked to his enemies. It was the weakest and the worst treaty ever negotiated by an American administration. It leads us to question either the intelligence and competency of our negotiators or their loyalty to the interests they represented. The fifteenth article relieves them from any imputation of lack of intelligence and reveals the true animus of the instrument. It reads as follows:

The fifteenth article of the treaty is as follows:

Whenever the United States shall remove the duty from fish-oil, whale-oil, seal-oil, and fish of all kinds (except fish preserved in oil), being the product of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of Canada and Newfoundland, including Labrador, as well as from the usual and necessary casks, barrels, kegs, cans, and other usual and necessary coverings containing the products above mentioned, the like products, being the produce of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of the United States, as well as the usual and necessary coverings of the same, as above described, shall be admitted free of duty into the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland. And upon such removal of duties, and while the aforesaid articles are allowed to be brought into the United States by British subjects without duty being reimposed thereon, the privilege of entering the ports, bays, and harbors of the aforesaid coasts of Canada and Newfoundland shall be accorded to United States fishing vessels by annual licenses, free of charge, for the following purposes, namely:

1. The purchase of provisions, bait, ice, seines, lines, and all other supplies and outfits.
2. Transshipment of catch, for transport by any means of conveyance.
3. Shipping of crews.

Supplies shall not be obtained by barter, but bait may be so obtained.

The like privileges shall be continued or given to fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland on the Atlantic coasts of the United States.

The purpose is here as plainly as if expressly stated that the fisherman must submit to all annoyances, grievances, and wrongs to which he has been subjected until Canadian fish and fish products shall be admitted free of duty into our ports, when, and not before, he shall be relieved from these injuries and harassments, and be entitled to qualified commercial privileges.

In order to secure these privileges, to which he was entitled by the principles of international comity, no less than by existing treaties and laws, he is asked to make this fatal concession against which he has struggled from the beginning as a man fights for his existence. And who is responsible for this attempted injustice? who but the President who controlled the negotiations upon our side and to-day defends the treaty? Sir, I denounce this treaty as part and parcel of the free-trade conspiracy which, inaugurated at the White House and continued here, seeks to prostrate American industry and impoverish and degrade American labor.

The other party to the negotiation understood this perfectly.

I have endeavored to show that where legislation providing for reciprocal commercial convenience or treaty stipulations of a similiar character were violated by Canada for the purpose of forcing us to alter our customs laws in her interest, the remedy would be found in retaliatory or responsive legislation in the same direction. The enforcement of such a policy would have secured promptly and fully the needed concessions by Great Britain. The moment our northern neighbors were made to realize that inconveniences and disadvantages could be mutual and bear with at least equal force against Canadian interests we should have found them in a mood to concede to us what was essential to their interests that we should concede to them. This was the policy of Congress embodied in the act of March 3, 1887. But it was not the policy of the President until this sudden conversion, almost as sudden as that of Saul of Tarsus. Doubtless, like him, he has seen a great light, which is growing brighter and brighter as November approaches. That light the Republicans in this Chamber and out of it hail as the dawning of a new and glorious day.

I speak of the President's conversion, and will ask the Clerk to read a letter written by him to Mr. Steele, of Gloucester, Mass.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, D. C., April 7, 1887.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your letter lately addressed to me and have given full consideration to the expression of the views and wishes therein contained in relation to the existing difficulties between the Government of Great Britain and the United States growing out of the refusal to award to our citizens engaged in fishing enterprises the privileges to which they are entitled either under treaty stipulations or the guaranties of international comity and neighborly concession.

I sincerely trust the apprehension you express of unjust or unfriendly treatment of American fishermen lawfully found in Canadian waters will not be realized. But if such apprehensions should prove to be well founded, I earnestly hope that no fault or inconsiderate action of any of our citizens will in the least weaken the just position of our Government, or deprive us of the universal sympathy and support to which we should be entitled.

The action of this Administration since June, 1885, when the fishery articles of the treaty of 1871 were terminated under the notification which had two years before been given to our Government, has been fully disclosed by the correspondence between the representatives and the appropriate Departments of the respective Governments, with which I am apprised by letter you are entirely familiar. An examination of this correspondence has doubtless satisfied you that in no case have the rights or privileges of American fishermen been overlooked or neglected, but that, on the contrary, they have been sedulously insisted upon and cared for by every means within the control of the executive branch of the Government.

The act of Congress approved March 3, 1887, authorizing a course of retaliation through executive action in the event of unfriendly conduct and treaty violations affecting American fishermen, has devolved upon the President of the United States exceedingly grave and solemn responsibilities, comprehending highly important consequences to our national character and dignity and involving extremely valuable commercial intercourse between the British possessions of North America and the people of the United States. I understand that in case recourse to the retaliatory measures authorized by this act should be invited by unjust treatment of our fishermen in the future the object of such retaliation might be fully accomplished by "prohibiting Canadian-caught fish from entry into the ports of the United States."

The existing controversy is one in which two nations are the parties concerned. The retaliation contemplated by the act of Congress is to be enforced, not to protect solely any particular interest, however meritorious and valuable, but to maintain the national honor, and thus protect all our people. In this view the violation of American fishery rights and unjust or unfriendly acts towards a portion of our citizens engaged in this business is but the occasion for action, and constitutes a national affront which gives birth to or may justify retaliation.

This measure once resorted to, its effectiveness and value may well depend upon the thoroughness and extent of its application; and in the performance of international duties, the enforcement of international rights, and the protection of our citizens, this Government and the people of the United States must act as a unit—all intent upon attaining the best result of retaliation, upon the basis of a maintenance of national honor and duty.

A nation seeking by any means to maintain its honor, dignity, and integrity, is engaged in protecting the rights of its people, and if in such efforts particular interests are injured and special advantages forfeited, these things should be patriotically borne for the public good. An immense volume of population, manufactures, and agricultural productions, and the marine tonnage and railways to which these have given activity—all largely the result of intercourse between the United States and British America and the natural growth of a full half century of good neighborhood and friendly communication—form an aggregate of material wealth and incidental relations of the most impressive magnitude. I fully appreciate these things and am not unmindful of the great number of our people who are concerned in such vast and diversified interests.

In the performance of the serious duty which the Congress has imposed upon me, and in the exercise upon just occasion of the power conferred under the act referred to, I shall deem myself bound to inflict no unnecessary damage or injury upon any portion of our people; but I shall nevertheless be unflinchingly guided by a sense of what the self-respect and dignity of the nation demand. In the maintenance of these and in support of the honor of the Government, beneath which every citizen may repose in safety, no sacrifices of personal or private interests shall be considered as against the general welfare.

Yours, very truly,

GROVER CLEVELAND.

GEORGE STEELE, Esq.,
President American Fishery Union, and others,
Gloucester, Mass.

Mr. DAVIS. Several things are to be noticed in this letter. First, there is no intimation that the remedies proposed in the statute are not sufficiently comprehensive and efficient; no suggestion that they do not go far enough to effect the purpose of the law. It does, however, take the extraordinary ground that the statute should be enforced on general considerations, and not to protect the interest specially involved.

I think the President is clearly wrong. No other interest was imperiled. This interest, and this alone, was in issue. The antagonistic attitude of the two governments related to this question only. The retaliatory legislation of Congress was intended to meet and correct this difficulty. The national honor was of course involved in securing justice for our fishermen, whose rights and interests had been wantonly assailed.

He could maintain the honor of his country no more effectively than by protecting against foreign aggression and outrage any class of citizens or any single citizen. He should have recollected the maxim which has come down to us from antiquity, that that form of government is the best in which an injury done to the meanest of its citizens is an injury to the state. He had before him the glorious example of the greatest of all the ancient nations, which resented with the whole force of her irresistible power any insult or injury to a Roman citizen, and whose policy in this respect was so well understood that the simple expression, "I am a Roman citizen," was a shield none dared pierce, wherever the name and power of the great republic were known and feared. [Applause.]

And, sir, in modern times the grandest feature of the English Government, representing a great people who have extended their dominion to every quarter of the globe, with an unequaled energy, ambition, and enterprise, is her protection of the rights of Englishmen wherever assailed.

I regret that an American President could not find inspiration and courage in such examples when confronted with similar exigencies and clothed with ample power. He refers to the great and increasing interests of the two countries in such a manner as plainly betrays a dread of responsibility. No fisherman after reading that unfortunate letter ever expected the President to enforce the legislation of Congress. The sheathed sword which was placed in his hand he dared not draw from its scabbard. No, sir; he dared not touch its hilt with his nerveless hand! Oh, for one hour of Dundee! Oh, for one day of Jackson or of Grant! [Applause.] But he has at last—thanks to the rejection of his treaty—found his courage. He has at last, perforce, taken the ground assumed by Congress eighteen months ago. Of course he has not enforced the retaliation act, but he has written a very courageous message to Congress asking for more power. He has not tried the experiment to ascertain whether a law deliberately passed by Congress and signed by himself is adequate to the emergency, and, if not, whether the Secretary of the Treasury has not sufficient power under existing law, as the ablest statesman living who has occupied that position declares that he has, and that it has already been exercised in similar cases.

Of course no imperious exigency exists at present for the action of Congress or the President, as no outrages are now being committed, and the fishing season is nearly closed. The exigency does not relate to our foreign affairs. It is strictly domestic, not to say partisan, and will terminate with the election, as the English friends of the Administration believe.

With the remaining part of his message concerning unjust discrimination against our commerce through the canals, along the course of the lakes and the St. Lawrence, and the steps to be taken to correct it, I am in entire accord. The attention of Congress and the country was months ago directed to this subject by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] and it has been discussed in the press ever since.

Can it be possible, however, that the President has not called the attention of the British authorities to this subject, and that they will first learn by his message to Congress that he is aware of this grievance and is determined to redress it? If this be so, or if complaint has been made so recently that they have not had sufficient time to reply, and diplomatic courtesy should be thus violated, they will doubtless attribute it to the political necessities of the situation, which are so urgent and grave as to call for an unusual step; and such seems to be the generous view taken by the English press, who are extremely friendly towards the Administration.

Mr. Speaker, I apprehend that this movement, with all its dramatic accompaniments, with all the applause here, and the telegrams of congratulations from the outside, is a little late. This change of base to Harrison's Landing is rather tardy. [Applause.] I am reminded of an incident in recent French history, where, during one of her revolutions, when the royal family had fled, the Duchess of Orleans took the infant heir of the throne in her arms and introduced him to the French Assembly as their King. She was greeted with shouts of "Trop tard!" "Trop tard!"—"Too late!" "Too late!" [Applause.]

So it is with this latest product of Democratic wisdom which is presented to us. The position of the President is in effect that the treaty was a mistake; that the Secretary of State was overreached by Mephistopheles Chamberlain, and that the result was "too truly English" [applause]; but that now he presents us with a genuine Democratic baby, having the strawberry mark of paternity on its shoulder, and that, young as it is, if pinched a very little by an Englishman, it will cry "Retaliation." The answer will be, that although it is a handsome child and looks as if its father might be a Republican, it comes too late. [Applause.]

Sir, death-bed repentance is better than none, but it can not be converted into a song of triumph, or treated as if it had any concern with the affairs of this world. And this utterance of the President in the expiring hours of his official service, which is in opposition to the entire policy of his Administration, can not and ought not to command the confidence of the country.

Mr. Speaker, this message will fail to affect the very class it was intended to influence. However much they may distrust and dislike the Tory Government of England, or its plenipotentiary, who was welcomed by this Administration, they do not ask that their feeling may be shared by this Government in its diplomatic relations with that country. They are, first and last and above every other consideration, American citizens, and they only ask that the Government of their adopted country shall adequately defend it against all undue foreign influence or aggression.

This class, among whom I am proud to rank myself, are profoundly grateful for the rights, privileges, and measureless and boundless blessings which a generous and paternal Government has conferred on them, and they would not seek to embarrass her relations with any foreign power.

American citizens of Irish birth or descent doubtless have faults, but you can not reckon among them their warm and uncalculating devotion to American interests and institutions, their readiness to defend them when attacked with tongue and pen and sword, a readiness which was proved by Montgomery beneath the walls of Quebec by the severest of all tests, the offering of his life, and by uncounted thousands of his humbler countrymen in our every hour of trial and martial conflict from then till now. [Applause.]

They will justly resent as an insult to their intelligence and patriotism the idea that a sham menace of opposition to Great Britain and Canada, closing a career of surrender and subserviency to both, should influence their suffrages. They have discovered the determination of this Administration to carry out its free-trade and British policy to the bitter end in the destruction of American industries and the impoverishment and degradation of American labor, and thousands of them have decided to cast their lot with that great party which wielded the destinies of our country for many glorious years in war and peace during the stormiest and grandest period of its history, and raised it to a height of honor, prosperity, and power unmatched in all the tide of time. [Applause.]

This party is about to resume its sway as the rightful representative of American ideas, policy, interests, and destiny, and its conquering battle cry is protection to American labor and American suffrage represented by a pure, intelligent, and unintimidated ballot. [Applause.]

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bills of the House numbered 7421, 7604, 8752, 10183, 1641, 5700, 1249, 8855, and 1239, in relation to the establishment of light-ships, light-houses, etc., Mr. CRISP, Mr. ANDERSON of Iowa, and Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HITT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] may be permitted to print certain remarks in connection with the pending bill.

Mr. McCREARY. I think leave was given generally this morning.

Mr. SCOTT. No, it was objected to by a gentleman on the other side.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I now submit the motion that any member who desires to do so may have leave to print on this question.

There was no objection.

THE FISHERIES.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL].

Mr. CHIPMAN. Before the gentleman proceeds I have twenty-two minutes of my time remaining since yesterday, and I ask unanimous consent to give that to my colleague [Mr. TARSNEY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be permitted to reserve that time.

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Speaker, if it be true of this world as of Heaven, "that there is joy over one sinner that repenteth more than over the ninety and nine just persons which need no repentance," then the American fisherman will be just paralyzed with joy to know that the disgraceful, bayardly policy of surrender of his rights has been "confronted with a condition" which has made necessary a change of that policy to one of an apparently manly and courageous determination that those rights shall be recognized and respected. True, he may think the change comes suspiciously late after these years of insult to the flag which he thought should have at once protected him. He may think there is and has been for a long while ample and sufficient law to promptly and effectively redress his wrongs and vindicate his rights, and of this he has no doubt. The "condition" which may have possibly prompted this may not inspire his confidence or his vote.

He may think it somewhat overdone. He may think it would be better to have been "faithful over a few things," by enforcing the present all-sufficient statute before more power was asked for, which may possibly be used to prejudice his cause with other great interests, that he may be ultimately forced into some other ignominious treaty and the surrender of his markets. He may wonder that the "lamb of peace at any price" has suddenly assumed the habiliments of the "lion of revenge," but I guess he will be "Yankee" enough to guess the reason why. But he will not "look a gift-horse in the mouth," as any interest in his cause by the present Administration will be regarded as not only a most gracious, but a most unexpected "gift." And his only real fear will be that the Canadian corsair may regard it as not sincerely meant, for his premier, Sir John Macdonald, already regards the President's message as illustrating to his mind, to use his own words—

More forcibly than ever before the wonderful and monstrous pitfalls which American politics will lead a man into.

And a London journal says:

There is no expectation that he—means to take any retaliatory measures against Canada. * * * Nor does any one attach the least importance to the message which Mr. Cleveland has addressed to Congress in consequence—of the rejection of the treaty.

The President—

Mr. Speaker, this is, indeed, a wonderful transformation. The United States, in strict accordance with its conditions, terminates a treaty disadvantageous to its interests. A Secretary of State, in the absence of the Senate, extends, or attempts to extend, the provisions of that disadvantageous treaty for six months, in violation of the Constitution. The United States Senate on assembling declares by an almost unanimous vote against any negotiations as to matters growing out of the termination of that treaty, preferring to rely upon our rights under previous and existing treaties and certain reciprocal legislation. The Congress of the United States, by an almost unanimous vote, gives the President ample powers to enforce, by retaliation in kind, those rights, which under those treaties and reciprocal legislation and international comity are all the rights and privileges the parties aggrieved and most interested desire or claim.

The retaliatory power is not exercised, nor is any attempt made to use it, even so much as by a hint. The policy of retaliation in kind, that is, denying to others the same privileges they deny to us, is ignored. Meanwhile, daily and hourly, more and more, the American fisherman is harassed, deprived of his rights and privileges, his voyages are broken up, his property destroyed, his occupation gone at the hands of Canadian cruisers in waters which are his in common with Great Britain. Then comes a proposed treaty, which nobody ever asked for and against which every fisherman in America protested, a treaty which surrendered much and gained nothing, except by further humiliation and sacrifice on his part. It contained no redress; it settled no grievance. It curtailed our fishing area. It yielded important and vital positions taken by us in regard to our fishing rights which had long been acquiesced in by Great Britain. It crept on its belly so low that it even agreed our fishermen should wear distinctive marks that they might be the more readily detected if they should unwittingly or otherwise infringe upon a provincial law or ordnance; that our navigation laws should be submitted to Her Majesty's Government before taking effect, and it actually proposed that this nation of ours should purchase immunity from barbarous treatment by a colony. And to all this truckling business the Democratic party said "Amen." "All hail to such great diplomacy."

Thanks to a Republican Senate, such a treaty was rejected.

And now, behold! Up from such abject and craven depths of almost disloyal diplomacy spring these treaty-proposing and rights-surrendering parties, and for what? To put in execution the ample and all-sufficient power already in their hands? No; but ask that the great and enormous power of retaliating upon everybody and everything may be granted; and again the Democratic party says "amen" and—flops.

Mr. Speaker, if this be political buncombe, then it is trifling with a great cause. If it be in good faith, then it is grotesque; it is taking a sledge-hammer to kill a fly to ask for all this great additional power to bring a few provincials to a sense of ordinary decency. It does not "make the punishment fit the crime." Already a returning sense is theirs since the treaty has been rejected. Says a leader of the Dominion Parliament all this—

Is due to the vicious policy of the Canadian Government in the administration of the rights secured to us by the treaty of 1818. If the Canadian Government had followed a more friendly course, there would not have been any unfriendly feeling to-day. Time and time again in the year 1885 American fishermen were arrested and their vessels detained for a single violation of the customs laws, which in all probability they did not know. It is no wonder that their hearts were bitter and that they made complaint at Washington. If, on the contrary, the Canadian Government had administered our laws as they conceived them under the treaty, in a friendly spirit, there would not have taken place what has taken place. * * * It is high time we reversed the policy we have been following toward the United States for the past twenty-five years.—Extract from speech of Hon. Mr. Lourier, at St. Thomas, August 27, 1888, taken from the New York Tribune of August 29, 1888.

The question is too great, too important, involving as it does rights older than the Constitution, and as sacred as the Declaration of Independence, to be treated either in anger or caprice.

But if there be a "Presidential doubt" again, that existing authority is not sufficient, which I do not admit, and it is thought best that more power be granted, then let it be done; but let it be understood, and I say it, as representing the largest fishing district in this country, that the American fisherman asks for no additional powers of retaliation, and that if granted and applied to the needless injury of other interests, the responsibility will alone rest with him who shall so exercise or abuse the power, and that such interests then must seek their remedy at the polls, and that if undue exercise of this new power of retaliation shall be attempted to prejudice and make odious the cause of the American fisheries, which is no more the cause of the fisherman than it is the cause of the entire country, he will trust the American people to vindicate their own.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill may pass, that there may be no possible excuse for any further exhibition of a want of pluck and patriotism in this regard.

I do not think this bill is really needed, or at all, and in my judgment its effect will only be to cause the scales to fall from the eyes of some, and let them behold—a pretender. [Applause.]

Mr. ROCKWELL. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eleven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] desires to address the House on this subject, and as he is necessarily called away by matters of urgent business, I have agreed to yield to him my position in the debate, but not my time, and hope the House will concede him the right of being heard now.

[Mr. SCOTT addressed the House. For his speech complete see the proceedings of the succeeding day.]

Before concluding his remarks—

Mr. McCREARY. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to conclude his remarks this afternoon?

Mr. SCOTT. I would prefer to proceed in the morning. There is very important matter connected with the debate, to which I desire to call the attention of the House.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I suggest that the gentleman proceed with his remarks until two minutes to 5 o'clock, when I will ask him to yield to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SCOTT. I shall be very much obliged if the House will consent to permit me to conclude my remarks in the morning, when I will also answer the question of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. McCREARY. If the gentleman will now yield, as the hour for adjournment is close at hand, I will make that motion.

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. McCREARY. Before making the motion to adjourn, I desire to ask unanimous consent on behalf of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he may be allowed to conclude his remarks in the morning. How much time, Mr. Speaker, remains to the gentleman?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has occupied fifty-five minutes of his time.

Mr. BELMONT. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman out of my time.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection whatever to the request that time be allowed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I hope it will be granted; but in connection with that I trust there will be no effort to limit debate, but that all gentlemen will be given the right who desire to be heard on this question.

Mr. McCREARY. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] has yielded fifteen minutes of his time, and it is very likely that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not require any considerable addition to his time from the House.

Mr. BRUMM. Why not give the time directly to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and not take it from any other gentleman?

Mr. McMILLIN. And let it be understood that similar time will be given to gentlemen on the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCREARY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 59 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

By Mr. BELDEN: Of 150 ex-soldiers and sailors of New York City.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, September 6, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ALLEGED TIMBER DEPREDATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of August 27, 1888, a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, together with other papers, upon which the Commissioner of the General Land Office based the statements in his letter to Hon. JAMES N. BURNES, of the House of Representatives, dated August 18, 1888, with regard to the amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill relating to the prosecution of persons in the mining region of the United States for cutting, for mining or domestic purposes, dwarfed or scrubby timber, unfit to be sawed or hewed into lumber of commercial value; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BLAIR presented the petition of Caroline V. English, widow of the late Lieut. Col. Thomas C. English, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying to be allowed an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of citizens of Hayes County, Nebraska, praying for the location of the Indian tribes of the Indian Territory upon their lands lying within the eastern portion of that Territory, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PUGH. In the absence of the Senator from California [Mr. HEARST], I wish to have read resolutions showing the action of a mass meeting in the city of San Francisco upon the subject of the Chinese exclusion bill now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent to have a telegram read. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. That subject will come up in a few minutes, when it will be more appropriate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a telegram purporting to transmit resolutions adopted at a meeting in San Francisco by its chairman, addressed to Hon. GEORGE HEARST. Shall it be read?

Mr. SHERMAN. It could more properly be read in a few minutes, when the Chinese bill comes up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The telegram will lie on the table, under objection, until that bill is before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to its being read, but the reading had better be deferred.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3060) granting right of way to the Pima Land and Water Company across Fort Lowell military reservation, in Arizona, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 952) for the relief of A. W. Hager, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3287) to authorize the appointment and retirement of Nathaniel C. Sawyer, late United States Army, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10856) for pension for Eliza N. Aiken, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3353) granting a pension to Mrs. Eliza N. Aiken, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1574) for the erection of a post-office building at St. Paul, Minn., reported it with amendments.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 10342) granting a pension to John Dauper;

A bill (H. R. 10563) granting a pension to William S. Latham;

A bill (H. R. 7185) granting a pension to Samuel Neikirk;

A bill (H. R. 10824) granting a pension to Mary A. Van Buskirk; and

A bill (H. R. 201) granting a pension to Edward Waters.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment:

A bill (S. 3446) granting to the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company certain tracts of land upon the Umatilla Indian reservation for station and railroad purposes; and

A bill (S. 3506) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885.

Mr. HAMPTON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3458) for the relief of General George Stoneman, to report it without amendment, and submit a report thereon. I ask that the memorial of General Stoneman be printed with the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar, and the memorial will be printed with the report if there be no objection.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2429) for the relief of Charles F. Holly, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3595) for the relief of C. M. Stinson, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7186) to authorize the Leavenworth and Rio Grande Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6612) to grant right of way through the Indian Territory to the St. Louis and San Francisco Railway Company, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes, to report it unfavorably on the ground that the relief proposed by the amendment can not properly be disposed of on an appropriation bill, and there should be a separate act to provide for the matter itself. I therefore report it adversely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will lie upon the table, the Committee on Indian Affairs being discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment:

A bill (S. 3100) to correct the military record of David C. Spears;

A bill (S. 3078) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of James S. Vaughn; and

A bill (S. 2868) to remove the charge of desertion from Michael Sullivan, alias Michael Murphy.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am also instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3120) to remove the charge of desertion against Godfrey Smalley, to report it adversely. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] introduced the bill. I am instructed to report the bill adversely and recommend that it be indefinitely postponed, as there is no merit whatever in the application.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. All right.

Mr. DOLPH. As the Senator states, I introduced the bill. If he had simply reported it back and asked that it be indefinitely postponed, I should not have made any objection; but after the statement of the Senator, I desire to examine the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3081) to remove the charge of desertion against Horace E. Ball, late of Company B, Second Connecticut Heavy Artillery, which was introduced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], have instructed me to report it back adversely, and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. The War Department have ample jurisdiction to remove this charge upon the presentation of satisfactory evidence. There were three charges of desertion upon the record, and they have already removed two of them. In 1885 and 1886 an explanation was asked in regard to the third charge, and as they have ample jurisdiction to remove it, and as we have no additional evidence which was not furnished to the War Department, we report the bill adversely.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator will allow the bill to go upon the Calendar?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. In view of the statement which the Senator has made, of course if the War Department will remove the charge of desertion that is all that is desired. From my recollection about the case, it is one in which the soldier ought to be relieved from the charge. Perhaps he has not made the proper proof, but I am convinced that he can make it either to the War Department or to the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. He made no proof in regard to the third charge. The petition seems to have been drawn up by his attorney, and it was never signed by him, and was never verified by affidavit. It makes the statement that the charge of desertion was made at a certain time. That charge has been already removed, but there is another charge, made in July, 1865.

Mr. PLATT. Let the bill go upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 912) granting bounty to Calvin C. Cooley, which was introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], have instructed me to report the same back adversely and to recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. Cooley joined a regiment as private and was voluntarily transferred to the regimental band, and served in that for about a year, when under an act of Congress all the regimental bands were discharged, and he was discharged and did not go back into the service. He is not entitled to a bounty any more than any other musician.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The adverse report will be agreed to and the bill indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 199) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William H. McBride, introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], to report it adversely and recommend that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill. The War Department have ample power to remove this charge of desertion, and will doubtless do so upon the presentation of a proper application.

The adverse report was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 947) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad from Ontonagon to the Wisconsin State line, etc., reported it with amendments.

CLAIMS OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. CHACE. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] August 16, 1888, in regard to the claims of postmasters, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to report to the Senate at the next session the amounts due all postmasters, their heirs or legal representatives, in the several States and Territories for services rendered the United States between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, the gross amount of earnings for each biennial term of service to be stated on the basis of the act of 1854, and the amount of compensation paid for the same term of service to be deducted therefrom, showing the actual difference in each case between the salary paid and the compensation computed on the basis of the act of 1854 for each biennial term of service; such report to be limited to cases in which the compensation paid is 10 per cent. or more less than the compensation already computed on the basis of the act of 1854, and to be made to the Senate from time to time as the statement covering the claims from each State shall be completed. And also to report any other facts in possession of the Department bearing upon these cases.

Mr. CHACE. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the resolution?

Mr. CHACE. It is simply a resolution asking the Postmaster-General to report the condition of postmasters' accounts.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to it.

Mr. PLATT. He is to report at the next session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over, the Senator from Missouri objecting.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 3522) regulating the purchase of timber from Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee on Indian Traders.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 3523) granting a pension to Amelia Erdmann; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 3524) granting a pension to Eliza R. Burdick; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 3525) granting a pension to Adam Bitner; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3526) for the relief of Sarah A. Kelley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3527) granting a pension to Lottie E. Dietrich; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALL (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 108) requiring consent of Congress for the construction of a bridge across the St. John's River, Florida, below Palatka, Fla.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RELATIONS WITH CANADA.

Mr. HOAR. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the attention of the President be respectfully called to the resolution of the Senate adopted August 28, ultimo, requesting him to communicate to the Senate copies of all communications addressed by his direction to the Government of Great Britain, remonstrating against certain unfair treatment of our citizens, and that he be requested to furnish such information as soon as possible in order that it may be considered in acting upon legislation now pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. VEST. Let it go over.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will allow me to explain it to him, and then of course it will go over if he desires that it shall.

This resolution merely calls the attention of the President to a resolution adopted on the 28th of August asking him to communicate to us copies of all remonstrances addressed to the Government of Great Britain and replies to those remonstrances, in regard to Canadian wrongs in the matter of transportation as set forth in his recent message.

It it quite obvious that the Senate needs that information at once, in order to be able to deal with the pending legislation, measures which have been introduced here and elsewhere. I think the Senator will have no objection to asking the President to send in that correspondence at once. It is a matter which obviously will take but an hour or two. I think every remonstrance which the President has addressed to Great Britain on this subject could be copied in half an hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. VEST. My only objection is that the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, to which this refers, was offered only on the 28th of August——

Mr. HOAR. It was passed on that day. It was offered on a previous day.

Mr. VEST. It was passed, then, on the 28th of August. It is today the 6th of September.

Mr. HOAR. Nine days since.

Mr. VEST. Nine days since. There seems to be a sort of implication in the resolution that there is some intentional delay upon the part of the Administration. I presume that is not true. I know nothing about it, but I want the resolution to go over, because I have no doubt the Secretary of State can give some reason for not sending in the papers.

Mr. HOAR. Let the resolution lie over. I think, however, the Administration could have got its eyes open in nine days. [Laughter.]

Mr. VEST. Oh, well, Mr. President, that is very facetious, exceedingly witty, but we do not know what the facts are.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution lies over under objection.

RECONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (S. 3086) granting a pension to Victor, Gertrude, Margaret, and Helen, minor children of Lieut. George R. McGuire, and the bill (S. 3087) granting a pension to Mary A. Pfeiffer, returned from the House of Representatives on the request of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. The Committee on Pensions having reported favorably upon equivalent House bills which are on the Calendar, I ask that the votes by which these Senate bills were passed be reconsidered, and that the bills be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The votes by which the bills were passed and ordered to a third reading will be reconsidered and the bills indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 1873) to limit the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts of the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. 7933) providing for the exchange of worn, defaced, clipped, punched, or otherwise mutilated silver coins of the United States, of smaller denomination than one dollar, for new or unworn subsidiary silver coin at designated places and under certain circumstances, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to correct a statement made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] in his speech yesterday, which I did not hear made at the time, or I should have asked his indulgence then to correct it. It is not a matter of great consequence, except that the mistake which the Senator fell into adds a weight to the statement which he quoted to which it is not entitled, and to those not any more familiar with the facts than the Senator appears to be may carry an idea in reference to the political sentiments of Western Massachnsetts to which it is not entitled. I desire to correct it lest I may seem to acquiesce in the statement of the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts rises to a personal explanation?

Mr. DAWES. Yes; I ask unanimous consent to correct a mistake.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Secretary to read the extract from the speech of the Senator from Florida yesterday that I have marked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the extract indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

I take pleasure in reciting here a statement from a well-known Republican newspaper published in Western Massachusetts, the Springfield Republican, which takes the position that Warmoth virtually gave up the battle on the eve of the election, and suggests a motive for it which is in harmony with the tactics of Southern Republicans in former contests.

It is as follows:

"[Springfield, Mass., Republican, August 23.]

"Senator CHANDLER delivered yesterday his speech upon the motion to inquire into the Louisiana election of April last. As to the merits of the particular motion, little need be said. He may have evidence of fraud in the spring elections, although he did not produce it. The argument by comparing the returns of previous elections will not do, because based upon the supposition that every negro is a Republican. Ex-Governor Warmoth, who was the Republican candidate for governor of Louisiana, presented Senator CHANDLER's argument to him three weeks before the elections. Up to that time he had led a good party fight. Suddenly he published a letter claiming that some kind of a deal had been made by which Governor Nicholls was to be counted in. He said that it was useless for him to contend against such odds. This was a direct invitation to his followers to refrain from voting. Hundreds of negroes voted for Nicholls, and they repeated the service at New Orleans a few weeks later, thus securing some of the offices at the hands of the Democrats. Warmoth's surrender upon the eve of battle astonished the Democrats, but there was method in his madness. The returns enrich Mr. CHANDLER's speech and give him a chance to make out a case upon paper. He succeeded in precipitating a series of personalties yesterday, and so far he was successful. The situation in the South has improved so wonderfully that it is sad to see this friend and advocate of the bloody shirt attempt to turn back the pages of history for partisan purposes."

It is not often that such an opportunity is afforded to call the attention of the country to the fact that there are Northern Republicans who not only understand the situation at the South but are willing to do justice to our section and to recognize the fact that our elections are influenced and controlled there by like causes that control and influence elections in other sections of the country.

When such utterances as this from the Springfield Republican are more frequent and the people of the North rebuke the politicians who are always trying to array one section against another for purely partisan purposes, we shall have made a great advance in dealing with this race question in politics.

Mr. DAWES. The editors of the Springfield Republican are personal friends of mine, and are very much esteemed gentlemen wherever they are known. They would feel hurt if they supposed that I sat here in silence and heard their paper called a Republican paper. While they publish a paper of great value as a newspaper its politics are dreadful. They would resent at any time since 1872 to be called a Republican paper, and it would very much impair their influence in the political field in which they are earnestly at work if the idea should get abroad outside of Massachusetts that the sentiments uttered in that paper are sentiments coming from a Republican paper. Therefore I discharge a duty which I feel I owe to my personal friends in correcting the mistake which the Senator innocently fell into in denominating this a Republican paper, and in endeavoring to add weight to the argument made yesterday by quoting Republican authority to sustain it.

I simply do this out of a feeling that I not only do justice to the truth and the Republican, but a personal favor to friends to whom personally I am under obligations.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts what are the politics of the Springfield Republican at the present time?

Mr. SPOONER and others. Mugwump.

Mr. DAWES. The paper has been laboring since 1872 to the utmost of its ability, and with great success, in the service of the Democratic party. It calls itself independent, but having the name of Springfield Republican it goes abroad, where its exact position is not known, as a Republican paper, which it originally was. It is one of the most zealous supporters of President Cleveland.

Mr. ALLISON. Now?

Mr. DAWES. Now, at this moment, and has been during all the eccentricities of this Administration of any paper that has come to my observation. It does not hesitate to take professions and practice alike, without question.

Mr. PASCO. I have not been a reader of the Springfield Republican, though I have known a good deal of its history and know how high its reputation and character have been, and I know how fair a paper it used to be when it considered itself a Republican paper.

I will state that the extract which I read was taken from the Public Opinion, and it was there designated as a Republican paper, and I supposed the editor of the Public Opinion was well acquainted with the politics of the different newspapers from which he quoted.

However, whatever the politics of the paper may be, the sentiment as there expressed is fair and manly and just towards our people, and whether it comes from an independent, a Democratic, or a Republican source, it deserves to be commended. But it also comes from a Northern source, and is certainly commendable and fair towards our people; and I am very glad of this evidence that the light of Democracy is spreading out upon the western part of Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. The error into which the paper that took the extract fell was caused probably in the same manner as the Senator's mistake; it was because the paper has the name which it bore—it is an old paper—when it did advocate Republican principles with earnestness, as it does everything that it advocates. But wherever its exact politics are understood, and have been since 1872, when it left the Republican party to support the Democratic candidate for the Presidency that year, it has never claimed, and never would claim, that it was a Republican paper or supported Republican candidates or Republican principles, except when those principles were those which a man could consistently support and still fight the battles of the Democratic party.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

DISTRICT ELECTRIC WIRES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, pursuant to the order of yesterday the Senate resumes the consideration of the resolution reported by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] from the Committee on the District of Columbia in relation to the erection of overhead electric wires. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution reported adversely by Mr. FARWELL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, September 3, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to revoke any permit granted for the erection of overhead electric wires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] to indefinitely postpone the resolution.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I should very much prefer that this resolution should go over until the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] could be present in the Senate. He opposed the action on the part of the commissioners in granting a permit to the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railroad Company, and I had supposed after the debate that was had here, and after the action of both Houses of Congress as evidenced in a provision in the District of Columbia appropriation act, that this matter had been virtually settled.

We passed a resolution instructing the Committee on the District of Columbia to report a resolution in effect forbidding the commissioners from giving a permit to put up overhead electric wires in the city of Washington. Now, the Committee on the District of Columbia report back a resolution to that effect with the recommendation that the Senate do not adopt it, and we are asked, upon the evidence which they report and which is contained in a printed pamphlet that I have before me, to reverse the former action of the Senate and to substantially abandon the provision in the District of Columbia appropriation act, which was, I think, unanimously adopted by both Houses of Congress, and to say to this Eckington and Soldiers' Home corporation that they have the right to put up overhead electric wires in this city.

I ask the Secretary, in the first place, to read the provision in the District of Columbia appropriation act recently passed, so that we may properly understand the status of this question.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The commissioners of the District of Columbia shall not, after the 15th day of September, 1888, permit or authorize any additional telegraph, telephone, electric-lighting, or other wires to be erected or maintained on or over any of the streets or avenues of the city of Washington, and the said commissioners are hereby directed to investigate and report to Congress at the beginning of its next session the best method of removing all electric wires from the air or surface of the streets, avenues, and alleys, and the best method of interring the same under-ground, and such legal regulation thereof as may be needed; and they shall report what manner of conduits should be maintained by the city of Washington, if any, and the cost of constructing and maintaining the same, and what charge, if any, should be made by the city for the use of its conduits by the persons or corporations placing wires therein, and upon what terms and conditions the same should be used when required so to do, and for such investigation $1,000 is hereby appropriated: Provided, That the commissioners of the District may, under such reasonable conditions as they may prescribe, authorize the wires of any existing telegraph, telephone, or electric-light company now operating in the District of Columbia to be laid under any street, alley, highway, footway, or sidewalk in the District, whenever in their judgment the public interest may require the exercise of such authority; such privileges as may be granted hereunder to be revocable at the will of Congress without compensation and no such authority to be exercised after the termination of the present Congress.

Mr. VEST. This provision in the general appropriation law as to the expenses of the District of Columbia, although the inhibition did not take effect until the 15th day of September, most unquestionably declared the opinion of both Houses of Congress as to overhead electric wires for any purpose whatever.

I can not resist the temptation to say something in regard to the extraordinary action of the commissioners of this District, who, in the face of that inhibition adopted by both Houses of Congress, have granted a permit upon the technical ground that until the 15th day of September they were the exclusive judges in this matter, and could violate the expressed will of Congress or the principles upon which that will had been based. My friend in front of me [Mr. MORGAN] suggests in apt words that they asserted the right to do a thing which Congress had declared from a certain day to be unlawful.

Whilst a court of law might declare that these commissioners had this power under the statute, because the prohibition does not take effect until the 15th of September, in my judgment it would have been more appropriate (and I could use stronger language, I think, without overstepping the limits of legitimate discussion or of the truth) if the commissioners had not stuck in the bark, but had observed the spirit of the enactment which was made by both Houses of Congress upon this subject.

Right here, in this connection, I wish to dispose of the action of the commissioners; and I speak of them the more freely because they belong to the party of which I am a member. In my judgment their action has been most inappropriate and improper. They ought to have considered the action of Congress in passing this clause of the appropriation act as to all intents and purposes binding upon them as servants of the people of the United States officiating in this District.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VEST. Of course.

Mr. SPOONER. Did not the declaration by Congress that no such permit should be granted after a given date clearly imply that until the expiration of that date such permits might be granted and were to be granted?

Mr. VEST. I have stated that technically they had the power to grant the permit, but I assert at the same time, and I do not think it can be successfully contradicted, that the result of the debates in Congress and of the judgment of its members deliberately expressed in both Houses is that the system of overhead electric wires for any purpose whatever is wrong. I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I do not know why this limitation was extended to the 15th day of September.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question in that connection?

Mr. VEST. Of course.

Mr. HARRIS. If it was the intent and purpose of the provision in the District of Columbia appropriation act to prevent the putting up of another wire from and after the passage of that act, as the Senator now argues, can the Senator give me a reason why the act did not expressly say that from and after its approval no additional wires should be stretched overhead?

Mr. VEST. I was proceeding to remark that I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I have not been able to learn why it was that this particular date, the 15th of September, was selected as that upon which the prohibition should take effect. I say the conclusion reached by both Houses of Congress was against the overhead electric-wire system. I take it for granted, without inquiry or information, that there were some facts in connection with the wires already in existence in this city or with the rights of corporations who were erecting these overhead wires—some assurances given as to their removal—which caused the committee to report this limitation of the 15th of September.

But I say to the Senator from Tennessee that it is just as unquestionably true that the fact that there was a limitation at all shows that both Houses of Congress were opposed to the system, and therefore, in my judgment, it was inappropriate, to use no other language, on the part of our servants, the commissioners of the District of Columbia, to ignore the expressed opinion upon the part of Congress, and to take advantage of the fact that the prohibition did not go into effect until the 15th day of September in order to grant the permit to this particular corporation.

My friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, doubtless knows more about this limitation than I do. I have not asked him in regard to it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator that this particular limitation was put in in the conference committee. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] had charge of the District appropriation bill, and he can state more definitely than myself just why it was put in.

Mr. VEST. I am not here as a partisan, but I am here with the kindest possible feeling to the gentlemen interested in this enterprise. As I have taken occasion to say again and again, and as is the absolute truth, I am utterly opposed to the present horse-car system which obtains in the city of Washington. I think it is a disgrace and a public calamity as it is now operated. As I want nothing but the truth, I should be glad if the Senator from Kansas would tell us why that limitation was put in the act.

Mr. PLUMB. The 15th of September?

Mr. VEST. Yes, the 15th of September.

Mr. PLUMB. The whole subject was before the conference committee, that is to say, the subject of exclusion or inclusion. We did not feel that there had yet been sufficient demonstration of the possibility of putting wires under-ground to warrant us in compelling that to be done now; but on the insistence of the House conferees that something should be done in deference to this sentiment we agreed to put in a date beyond which no more permits should be granted for the erection of wires in the streets. The Senator will observe by the language that it does not apply to alleys, the commissioners stating that no ill effect would grow out of the erection of overhead poles in alleys. It was stated with great force to us that persons had built houses with the expectation that they would be able to make connection with this system of lighting to go up in this city, and that they ought to be accommodated, and that there were quarters of the city into which the system might be properly extended at present.

It was designed to give the commissioners until the 15th day of September, knowing that they themselves were in favor of submerging the wires, to determine what could be properly done with the view of meeting some such conditions as those. The railroad matter was not suggested at all. No member of the committee spoke of it. I did not know that a railroad charter had been obtained in which a provision was made for electric motors; I never thought of it. We were thinking simply of the overhead telephone wires, and overhead telegraph wires, and the overhead lighting wires. That was all. Nothing else was taken into account.

Mr. VEST. That is what I supposed.

Mr. PLUMB. But it seemed that there ought to be some leeway, that where buildings had been erected and various improvements undertaken in reference to this form of lighting we should not compel either the company or the public to be absolutely cut off from the mutual benefits which might arise out of such extensions as the commissioners in looking over the ground might deem advisable up to the 15th day of September.

I can say for myself, without the matter having received any further attention in conference (that is, I do not know that that feature of it was specially mentioned), my idea was plainly and clearly that the commissioners might issue permits up to the 15th of September which would be operative beyond that time. That is the idea I had about it. We knew practically, from the conference which we had with them, their views on the subject. We knew, as we thought, that they would not exercise this authority to any very great extent, and would not go beyond what the public convenience seemed to require. I was perfectly willing, so far as I was concerned, and I think the language carried out that idea, that they should grant permits up to the 15th of September, but which should operate beyond that time. For instance, they might grant permits up to that time to carry wires to be put up at a later period, into different quarters of the city, where the conditions of which I spoke existed, they of course doing it all with a knowledge of the fact that they were required to report to the next Congress, if they were warranted in doing so by what they should determine by investigation, a plan whereby all these wires were to be put under-ground. We felt, therefore, that they would not exercise the authority in any bad way.

Mr. VEST. I understand, then, from the Senator from Kansas that the question which is now before the Senate as to these elevated or overhead electric wires for this Eckington Railroad was not contemplated or considered by the committee of conference at all; and, as I supposed before I made the inquiry, the fixing of a day in futuro as the date when this prohibition took effect was put there with reference to the present overhead electric wires used by the telegraph and telephone companies. But I still insist that the expressed will of Congress was against all these overhead electric wires, because if it was right to prohibit them after the 15th day of September, or, leaving out that, if Congress had come to that conclusion, then the commissioners of the District of Columbia ought to have respected that opinion and that will. Speaking for myself, I would unquestionably, if placed in that position, have so considered it.

But I proceed without any intention to do injustice to these gentlemen, and let the commissioners of the District of Columbia give their own version of the matter. Mr. S. E. Wheatley, one of the District commissioners, was examined by the Committee on the District of Columia.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me before he goes into that evidence to call his attention to this law, which seems to have been entirely overlooked in the debate so far as I have heard.

The commissioners of the District of Columbia shall not, after the 15th day of September, 1888, permit or authorize any additional telegraph, telephone, electric lighting, or other wires to be erected or maintained on or over any of the streets or avenues of the city of Washington.

I can not understand, if this is the law of the land, why that word "maintained" does not stand there to make unlawful any act of the commissioners of the District of Columbia permitting electric wires or any other wires of that kind to be maintained after the 15th day of September.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator to read the rest of the clause, where the District commissioners are required to investigate the practicability of putting the wires under-ground and $1,000 is appropriated to enable them to conduct that investigation.

Mr. MORGAN. That is very true, but that word "maintained" has to go out of this text, or else it is unlawful to maintain the wires after the 15th of September.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the construction which the conferees put upon it is illustrated very fairly by the use of the word "maintained" there. The idea was that they should not issue permits after the 15th of September, nor permit any wires to be erected after that date. I mean to say they could not grant permits after that date. The maintenance there of the wires had reference to wires that were put up without the permits which are provided for, and which might be issued up to the 15th of September. Of course, the language is not as plain as it ought to be, and it only illustrates how entirely right our Committee on Appropriations originally was in insisting that the provision ought to go out and that the subject ought to be taken up de novo by the committee having jurisdiction of that subject, to wit, the Committee on the District of Columbia, and not committed to the Committee on Appropriations, and of course necessarily in due time to a conference with other things, a portion of which were to be taken up perhaps and discussed and disposed of without that attention which they ought to receive.

Mr. MORGAN. It seems to me it would require positive legislation to authorize the maintenance in the District of Columbia after the 15th of September of any telephone or telegraph wires, especially so as to those which required permits from the District commissioners. My vote upon this measure will be controlled by that construction of it, at all events.

Mr. VEST. I rather think the construction of the Senator from Alabama is the correct one, but I base my observations in regard to the action of these commissioners, not upon any construction of that statute technically, but upon the simple fact that both Houses of Congress have condemned that system and that the District commissioners knew it, and that they deliberately availed themselves of a power given to them, a discretion until the 15th of September, to put the broadest construction upon it, in order to violate what they knew to be the expressed statutory opinion of the representatives of the people of the United States. As I do not want to do them any injustice, I give them the full benefit of their own explanation of what seems to me to be most extraordinary conduct. Mr. Wheatley, one of the commissioners, was examined before the District Committee, and I will read from his evidence:

Q. Before you granted that permission—

That is to the Eckington Railway—did you take counsel about it?

A. We gave the matter considerable thought and discussion. One of the members of the board, Mr. Webb, is a lawyer, and we decided to issue the permit after considerable thought and discussion, and it is clearly legal under the requirements of that bill.

It never seems to have suggested itself to Mr. Wheatley that it was improper for him or that board to have violated the unquestionable will of Congress, but he says it was lawful. He sticks in the bark about it, and acts with Congress as if they were adversaries instead of being agents and servants of the people, or as if they represented some foreign interest against the Government and against the people and against the Senate and against the House. He says it was lawful.

Then in regard to this particular construction of overhead system, of overhead motive power, we have Major Raymond's views upon that subject.

Not his views, but the views of Major Raymond. Mr. Wheatley says:

Then, in regard to this particular construction of overhead system, of overhead motive power, we have Major Raymond's views upon that subject.

Major Raymond is the engineer officer of the commissioners; and afterwards, upon the very next page, he is put on the stand, and here is what he said. It seems that his views and opinions were potential in this matter with the board. Major Raymond was examined and testified:

By Mr. FARWELL:

Q. Do you consider the electrical system which is proposed to be used for the Eckington Railroad at all dangerous to life?

A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. Are you sufficiently familiar with the character of electricity and the quantity necessary to be used as to be prepared to make that statement?

A. No, sir; I am not.

Major Raymond is a remarkable expert. This is the gentleman upon whose opinion this board of commissioners trample upon the express law of Congress, and yet he says he knows nothing about it.

I make that statement as the result of what little experience I have had in electricity, and as the result of inquiries which I made of men who know more than I do.

Second-hand information.

I am not an electrical expert, and I do not appear in that capacity.

I take it if there ever was a witness who discredited himself on a subject-matter on which he was being examined that witness has done so; and yet his opinion is the sole basis upon which this question was disposed of by the District commissioners in the very teeth of the action of Congress, which is now part of the statute law of the land.

Mr. CHACE. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not, in view of this provision in the District appropriation bill, he considers that the commissioners were authorized and empowered to issue such permits up to the 15th of September?

Mr. VEST. I have not examined the matter as a lawyer should, and I have long since adopted as one of the fundamental rules in the practice of my profession to give no opinion by which I choose to be bound or ought to be bound without a critical examination of the instrument conferring the power. My impression in this case from what I have read—and I simply read it not so much as a lawyer as because I wanted information on this whole subject—is that these commissioners do have that power up to the 15th of September.

I thought I said that before. That, however, is not the point I make. I say it was improper, inappropriate, extraordinary for these commissioners to stand upon a legal technical power when they occupied the position of trustees or agents for the people, and when they were under the control of Congress and ought to have a decent respect for the opinions of both Houses of Congress and of the President of the United States solemnly expressed. I do not think my friend from Rhode Island would have done it.

Mr. CHACE. I certainly should if I had been one of the commissioners.

Mr. VEST. I do not think yet, notwithstanding his disavowal, that my friend from Rhode Island, in the teeth of that expressed will of both Houses of Congress, if he had been a commissioner of this District, would have seized hold of that technical power—for it was nothing else—and issued those permits in the face of the language, which even if you do not give it the broad meaning that the Senator from Alabama gives it, prohibiting the maintenance of overhead electric wires after the 15th of September, still in its spirit and soul condemned the whole system whether applied to telegraphs, telephones, or the motive power of railroads.

Mr. President, I have honestly performed what I conceived to be my duty, and according to the promise I made to the Senate yesterday I examined all this evidence last night, and I think as an impartial juror, I must say if I have any feeling in the world in the matter it is in behalf of the corporators, and, besides that, I am unalterably opposed to horse-car railroads, and I have sat here for eight long years and condemned and denounced this infamous system in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SPOONER. How can a juror be impartial and lean to any side?

Mr. VEST. I say if I am not an impartial juror, I lean to the side of the Senator from Wisconsin, and I infer from his remarks that he is decidedly in favor of this system. I lean to the side of this electric railway because I want that system introduced into this District; but I repeat here now I would as soon stand here and defend the old flint-lock musket, that passed away with the arsenal at Harper's Ferry and is now one of the relics of the past, as to stand here and defend the system of horse-car railroads. And yet every Senator here knows that in this District we have, notwithstanding our protestations and remonstrances, streets in this beautiful city absolutely ruined by the present rails, with the cobble-stones between, over which no vehicle can pass without inconvenience and almost absolute danger. All my sympathies are with the men who want to put up electric roads in this District, but I am here as a trustee as well as these commissioners, and I simply give to my brother Senators the result of my examination of this testimony and my deliberate judgment, and if I could honestly and conscientiously vote in accordance with the recommendation of this committee I would do it with the greatest pleasure imaginable.

I have great personal respect for the men engaged in this enterprise, who are men of high character in this District. I do not blame them; but as a matter of course they are looking to the success of their enterprise. They want to construct this road as cheaply as possible and with a view to the largest dividends. If I were to say that they expected anything else, I should simply remove them from the ordinary frailties of human nature and put them in the attitude of angels or gods, which I presume they are not. They have the same motives that every corporator has, and it is my duty as a servant of the people, as I conceive it to be, to do justice to them and at the same time justice to my constituents, who are interested in this District as much as the people who reside here.

I have examined this testimony not as critically as I would have done if I were counsel in the case and with a brief, but as carefully as my other duties would permit, and I must be permitted to express my regret, with great respect to the District Committee, that they did not examine one single witness, so far as I have seen, that was not connected directly or indirectly either with this electric railroad company or with the Thomson-Houston Electric Company, who under contract are furnishing the electric motive power to this corporation. If I am mistaken in that I can be very easily corrected.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will allow me a word. I was not present at the hearing before the Committee on the District of Columbia, but I desire to remind the Senator that that committee was not charged by any order of the Senate with an investigation into the subject. They were given jurisdiction by an unusual proceeding, and that was a motion that they grant to certain parties who petitioned the Senate, and who I believe were the parties in interest in the construction of this particular railroad, a hearing. That was the direction laid upon the committee, and with that mandate the committee complied absolutely.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will allow me to supplement the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin, there was before the committee a large number of affidavits and certificates from persons of experience in the use of electric power. I have not noticed to see whether or not they appear in the report that the Senator from Illinois presented, but a large number of persons who had no connection whatever with the companies referred to by the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. VEST. Perhaps my statement was a little too broad, but I certainly intended to make no imputation either of negligence or otherwise on this committee either in the aggregate or individually; but I think that when they went into this question, when they undertook to examine witnesses, they ought to have done so thoroughly. They have reported here against the action of the Senate deliberately taken. They were instructed to report a resolution prohibiting the commissioners from putting up overhead electric wires. They report back that resolution, but at the same time recommend that it be rejected, and as a ground for their action they furnish us testimony taken by them; and, under the familiar legal maxim, once in court they must remain in court and stand the test of examination and cross-examination, and I have the right to comment upon that testimony and the facts which it assumes to present. I agree that I possibly stated it too broadly when I said there was not a single person whose testimony was taken here—I ought to be more accurate in my statement—that was not connected directly or indirectly either with this railroad company or the electric company, or who was not directly interested in the contract.

Mr. SPOONER. They were the parties to whom the committee was instructed to give a hearing.

Mr. VEST. With due deference to the Senator from Wisconsin, who interrupts me, I did not know that the committee was instructed to give any hearing.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to state a fact that perhaps he is not aware of?

Mr. VEST. With pleasure.

Mr. HARRIS. I think the very morning after the passage of the resolution of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] presented a memorial and asked that it be referred to the committee with instructions that the committee hear the memorialists in respect to the subject-matter, which was the application of electric power and the use of electricity.

Mr. VEST. Not only as a lawyer, but a legislator and an individual, I am bound by the report of this committee, and most unquestionably the committee is bound by it; and I find in the heading of the report the following:

> The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the order of the Senate referring letter of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, with instructions to report a resolution requesting the commissioners to revoke any permit granted for erection of overhead electric wires, report.

That was the subject-matter before the committee, and nothing else.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator again allow me?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. The particular resolution in question was, according to the custom of all committees of this body, referred to one of its members to report on, while the other subjects kindred and immediately connected with it were referred to other subcommittees to deal with. The Senator reads from the report of a Senator who was especially charged with the particular resolution in question.

Mr. VEST. Well, Mr. President, that particular resolution in question is the matter before the Senate—that, and that alone. This committee, instructed to report a certain resolution referred to them, make a report, but they put a poison in its blood that destroys it, and they bring it back to the Senate with the recommendation that it be not adopted. I know so little about parliamentary law that I scarcely dare to indulge in a criticism in the presence of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. It is my misfortune that I never knew but two rules of parliamentary law, and one was that a motion to adjourn was always in order, and that a motion for the previous question was always in order, but since the rules of the Senate struck out the latter rule in regard to the previous question, I have been going single-handed with the former, and I have found out sporadically that not even that one is always in order. So, with my little parliamentary knowledge, I hardly like to indulge in a criticism upon the committee; but it seems to me when they were instructed to report back a resolution specifically, they ought to have done it; but instead of that, they reported it back with deadly killing blight upon it in the nature of a recommendation that it be not adopted, and then they proceed to give us the testimony upon which that recommendation is based, from which I am now quoting.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator mean that the committee was deprived by the action of the Senate of all power of recommendation in reporting the resolution back? Were we bound to report it back with the recommendation that it pass, when every member of the committee was opposed to its passage?

Mr. VEST. I beg pardon. I am so poor a parliamentarian that if I go by the rules of common sense I must be excused. I thought that when the Senate instructed its servants and agents to do a particular thing they ought to do it.

Mr. CHACE. Right there I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri what could have been the object of referring that resolution to the Committee on the District of Columbia if it was not to have their judgment upon the propriety of its adoption?

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Vermont, who, I will undertake to say in his absence or presence, generally knows exactly what he means and adopts the proper instrumentalities to effect his object, drew this resolution, and I take it that if he meant that the Committee on the District of Columbia ought to examine and report he would have said so, but the Senator from Vermont said they were instructed to report a resolution. He did not draw the resolution, but I understood after the long debate we had here that the only province of that committee was to report a resolution, draughted in appropriate terms to do that thing, which was to prohibit this Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railroad from putting up overhead electric wires. If that is not the meaning of it, it is my limited parliamentary knowledge which must excuse me in the eyes of my friends from Rhode Island and Wisconsin.

Now, Mr. President, without intending to be hypercritical, from my cursory examination I find some strange things in this testimony. Mr. Mansfield, the electrical engineer of the Thomson-Houston Company, was put upon the stand and examined by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], a member of the committee. We come now to the question whether these overhead electric wires are dangerous to animal life. Upon that point, when the committee were examining witnesses, the Senator from Virginia asked this question of George W. Mansfield:

> You think under a thousand there is no danger?

Which I may say in an explanatory way referred to a thousand volts, which seems to be the unit of all electric power, and is a technical term, if I may be permitted to insert this to make myself understood. Mr. DANIEL'S question was:

You think under a thousand [volts] there is no danger?
A. It is perfectly safe to human life.

Anywhere under a thousand volts.

Q. What is the charge of electricity that is given remedially to persons who are being treated with electricity?
A. I could not state.

Understand that the electrician of this company states that under 1,000 volts the electric current is perfectly harmless to human life. On the very next page and almost in the same sentence he is asked by the acting chairman:

Q. What number of units per car does your company contract to furnish the Eckington Company?
A. I think it was originally talked over, and 500 volts was decided upon, as we are using 500 volts on all the roads we are building and that are now in operation. But in this particular instance we thought best to possibly keep that potential to 400, as there seemed to be a feeling that there was some danger in connection with it.

This very same gentleman had declared one minute before that it was perfectly harmless under 1,000 volts, and yet he declares that they reduced it in this contract between Thomson-Houston Company and the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company to 400 volts, 600 volts under the thousand, because there was some danger in it.

Mr. HARRIS. Not because there was some danger, but because there was some apprehension in the public mind of danger.

Mr. VEST. Let me read what he says; I will let him speak for himself.

But in this particular instance we thought best to possibly keep that potential to 400, as there seemed to be a feeling that there was some danger in connection with it.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes.

Mr. VEST. Now, where that feeling was, who entertained it, why they should reduce it under 500 volts, which they say themselves was necessary, is something they can explain possibly, but it seems a little uncertain and nebulous to my mind. It was, to say the least of it, a deference to public opinion upon the part of the railway constructors that I am glad to see obtaining in this community and throughout the country, something we have long sought and much needed.

Now, upon the question of danger I have not endeavored to find instances in which there has been injury to animal life or human life by reason of these overhead electric wires, and without any exertion upon my part I present to the Senate for what it is worth, a statement which the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] handed to me not twenty minutes ago, contained in the Cleburne Chronicle, of Cleburne, Tex., which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SHOCKED TO DEATH.

AUSTIN, TEX., August 27.

Edward Ramsey, a young colored man, at 1 o'clock to-day had occasion to cross the roof of a building near Congress avenue. An electric motor wire ran across the roof. In some unknown manner Ramsey came in contact with it and was instantly killed. When the body was found it was still limp. A doctor was summoned, but life was extinct. On examination it was found the insulation of the wire was intact, and the theory is that it was too thin and the heavy rain which fell this morning so saturated it as to destroy insulation altogether. The shock was so strong that it burned the flesh off of two fingers of Ramsey as he clutched the wire. No other marks were left on the body.

Mr. VEST. Now, Mr. President, I desire to say so far as I am concerned in regard to that question of the danger to human life or of injury to the human body by this system, that much as I favor the electric system as applied to motive power for railways in this District and elsewhere, if it be dangerous to one single human life it is no argument to me to say that those accidents are infrequent. I hold it to be my duty as a legislator, if the object can be obtained at additional expense, but without danger to human life, to adopt that method and no other. I have never yet come to the conclusion that the life of any human being should be endangered in order to save any amount of money to any corporation or to any individual; and I am not speaking about corporations invidiously. Human life is above everything else. The man who legislates in any capacity and disregards life and limb in the interest of money is, in my judgment, unworthy the place of a legislator, State or national. If the humblest citizen of this District in passing along a street where these overhead wires are suspended is in danger by any sort of unforeseen accident, that risk should not be taken by the legislators of the country, who are the custodians of that life and liberty in the highest degree and in the most sacred manner.

I have not compiled statistics to show that these electric overhead wires are dangerous. I am not here to comment upon the degree of credibility which should attach to the statements of newspapers. Like any man of ordinary intelligence, I have an impression upon the subject, gathered from the daily current statements of the press and from my own intellectual conclusions about them. My friend in front of me, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], tells me that in the city of Montgomery, the capital of his State, a railroad with suspended electric wires has been abandoned on account of its destruction to animal life, horses, mules, and human beings. I believe—and I can be corrected if I misstate it—that the governor of the State recently, in driving along with his horse and buggy, encountered one of these wires, which by a storm or insufficient attachment had become loose and was trailing upon the surface of the street, and the horse put his foot upon it and in a single instant it was dead. I am told by the Senator from Alabama that so great was the complaint upon the part of the people of that city against that system, and so dangerous was it, that it was abandoned or went out of operation four months ago, and has not been reconstructed.

I am not giving this testimony as a witness or an expert, but I am bound as an intelligent man to be governed by these statements coming from reputable sources. I admit that in this pamphlet there are a large number of statements coming from persons attached to this railroad company—its officers and employés—and from the employés of the Thomson-Houston Electric Company, coming from a place in Masschusetts called Crescent Beach, which, I take it, is the place where this Thomson-Houston Company have their manufactory.

Mr. HOAR. I think that is in Lynn.

Mr. VEST. I only know from the headings of the letters, not being acquainted with the locality—"Crescent Beach, Mass."—and these witnesses, the parties who gave these ex parte statements without cross-examination, say that they are employés of this electric company, and they put their hands upon these wires with 500 volts of electric power and simply felt a pleasurable sensation like an amatory caress from some loved person.

Mr. HOAR. I think that this is not important enough to interrupt the Senator for, but I think Crescent Beach is in the city of Lynn, which is probably 8 miles out of Boston. The company have their factory in Lynn and their business place in Boston. They employ some fifteen hundred hands in constructing works in different parts of the world.

Mr. VEST. The material part of my statement is simply that these ex parte presentations come from the employés of the electric company, and they tell us that five hundred volts of electric power when injected or shot into a man produce simply a pleasurable sensation and are not at all dangerous to human life.

There is nothing whatever to restrain this company from increasing the amount of electric power that they see necessary to use hereafter, notwithstanding their original contract. They claim as a matter of course under their act of incorporation the power to use as much electric force as is necessary. They have made a contract, they state, for the use of four hundred volts or units of electricity as motive power, but hereafter, if they see proper, they can make it one thousand, or fifteen hundred, or two thousand. There is no limit upon their contracting capacity in that regard.

Mr. President, aside from this question of danger, there is another element to be considered which was not much alluded to the other day in the debate that preceded the reference of this matter to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It is proposed, according to the testimony of the officers of this company, to place in the middle of the street along their route to the Soldiers' Home——

Mr. HARRIS. To the boundary.

Mr. VEST. One mile of this route being inside of the city limits and 2 miles outside, it is proposed to place in the middle of the street what they call ornamental iron posts, from which are to be suspended the electric wires. If this electric power can be used with perfect safety to life and limb without any disfigurement or inconvenience to the public by reason of these posts being placed in the streets of the city, why should it not be done? Why should we now give to this corporation, with our past experience with street-railroad corporations in this city, the power to further disfigure the streets of the most beautiful city upon this continent, if not in the world? We have had for years and years upon the streets of this city these miserable car-tracks that are a disgrace to civilization, and we are not able to remove them. The men who own them declare enormous dividends year after year, and yet they persist in maintaining these monstrosities against public sentiment and the will of Congress.

There is one clause in the letter of the attorney of the Thomson-Houston Electric Company that made these contracts, which it seems to me is most suggestive, if not conclusive as to what should be the action of Congress in this matter. Mr. George W. Mansfield, representing the Thomson-Houston Electric Company, and signing himself attorney for it, says:

In conclusion, by all means put the wires under-ground if you can afford to adopt any plan that will insure an efficient, satisfactory service. It will improve the appearance of your city, will remove one of the least of the obstructions in your streets, but will not in any appreciable degree lessen the dangers that surround you.

Even this paid attorney, salaried by this company, says these wires, if they can afford it, should be put under-ground because then they will not disfigure the streets of the city of Washington. He states that it will not lessen the danger to put them under-ground, but he says:

That will insure an efficient, satisfactory service. It will improve the appearance of your city, will remove one of the least of the obstructions in your streets.

Is it possible—and I come to the gist of this whole matter—to have an electric railway in the city of Washington without these overhead wires disfiguring the streets and endangering animal life? Can the conduit system, as it is called, be adopted in this city successfully, and is it practicable? That is the whole question before us, it seems to me, to-day. The president of this company admits in his testimony under oath—for I presume he was sworn—that at Allegheny City, in the State of Pennsylvania, there is a conduit electric railway now in operation, and the most successful of any in the United States. I stated yesterday, as one of the reasons why this matter should be postponed until to-day, that I had some papers that had been sent to me on this subject. I do not know why they were sent to me. I do not know but that every other Senator has received them; but they may possibly have been sent to me because I took part in the debate upon this question before. They come from the Bentley-Knight Electric Railway Company, of 115 Broadway, New York. They contain an explanation of the whole conduit system. It seems that there are three systems in regard to the use of electric power as a motor for railways. The one is the reservoir system, as you might term it——

Mr. ALLISON. Storage.

Mr. VEST. The storage system; I believe that is the word. Another is the conduit system; another is the cable system; and you might say a fourth one is the overhead electric wire system. The cable system, according to the testimony, is the most expensive, although I may be permitted to say that four of these roads are in operation in the city where I live most successfully and to the entire satisfaction of the public. There was great prejudice against them at first. I have never had any interest in any of them and can not speak accurately as to the cost, but I know from friends who have made investments that they have paid enormously, and to-day the stock of the first railroad constructed there is not for sale at all on account of its enormous value. I find from a perusal of these papers which come from the Bentley-Knight Railway Company that they can construct a conduit system, unless they encounter peculiar obstacles by reason of locality, for $20,000 a mile, and I will read, for such information as it may impart to Senators who may not be better informed than myself, an estimate:

Average prices—

This is for New York City, and I take it that the construction here would not be more expensive. They give the estimate for a horse railway, for an electric railway, and for a cable road. This is for a double track of 5 miles, which we will call a track of 10 miles in length.

Ten miles track, at $7,000 per mile, for an electric railway, $70,000; 40 cars, at $700 each, $28,000. Ten miles of conduit, at $25,000 per mile, $250,000; steam plant, $20,000; dynamo plant, $24,000; 40 motor trucks, at $1,500 each, $60,000; building, $10,000—$462,000.

The estimate for a cable road of the same length is $803,000.

For a horse-railroad, which includes four hundred horses in the estimate, it is $204,000.

At a rough calculation in the city of Washington for an electric railroad on the conduit system, with under-ground wires, the cost would be upon this basis $218,000.

After all, Mr. President, we come now to the real difficulty in this case. I do not think that any of the friends of this enterprise will say that the conduit system is not the best, but it is the difference in cost to which they object. These gentlemen frankly said in their statements before this committee, and they have stated to me personally, for they have called upon me in regard to it, and they are men of intelligence and foresight, that they have not money enough to build a conduit road, and they appealed to me in this way: "You favor the electric system, but this is all that we are able to give you. Instead of opposing this upon the floor of the Senate, you ought to encourage it, because it is the entering wedge to the electric system in the District of Columbia, and we can afterwards improve it by adopting the conduit system when we are able."

I could go on, if the Senate chose to hear it, and read from the testimony, for whatever it is worth, the statements of the Bentley-Knight Electric Company in regard to a difficulty which has been suggested here about this conduit filling with snow and ice and water. They claim that in the road at Allegheny City they have found a mode in which all this difficulty can be obviated. They give statements, amply verified—and I wish the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], who knows these people, could look at the names—by men living in Allegheny City and holding official position there, that the road runs 7 miles an hour at heavy grades in places, carrying fifty passengers to a car, without delay winter or summer, and is a perfect railroad for 1 mile within the limits of that city.

It is proper to state that 1 mile of that railroad is in the city limits and 2 miles outside. They have sent me here the plates or photographs showing their cars in operation, with full and accurate descriptions, I take it, as to their capacity and as to their speed. Inside of the city they have the conduit system, because the authorities of Allegheny City would not permit the overhead electric wires. Outside they have the overhead electric wires, but inside the city, with the conduit system, notwithstanding the statement that snow and ice and water impede the cars in winter, they have had no delay and no trouble in operating them.

Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate. I have endeavored to speak fairly and justly, without feeling, in giving, as I am compelled to do in order to do my duty, my deliberate judgment. We had better wait until a company can be found that can raise the capital to adopt the conduit system, which we know is harmless to animal life, than to rush in and take the chances of this overhead electric system, which they themselves admit is an inferior system to the conduit system for streets. They place it upon the ground of cheapness and upon no other ground that I can see that amounts to anything.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the report of the committee that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the resolution that the Senate instructed the District Committee to formulate puts the Senate in what I conceive to be the humiliating attitude of petitioning or requesting public servants that the legislative department has the absolute right to command and control, and if there were no other ground involved, for that reason alone I would not favor the resolution that the Senate instructed the committee to report. The Senator from Missouri in referring to it used the language that our instructions were to prohibit or to compel. Not so. They were to formulate a resolution of the Senate and the Senate only, requesting the commissioners of the District of Columbia to rescind the permission that they had previously given and not to allow the wires to be put overhead.

In obedience to the instructions of the Senate the committee formulated the resolution and then expressed its opinion with absolute unanimity that no such resolution ought to be passed in the Senate; but within the same hour the committee reported a joint resolution adopting a proper legislative form to deal with the question effectively, which opens the whole question of electric wires overhead or underground; and when that resolution is to be considered the argument submitted by the Senator from Missouri this morning will be something perhaps appropriate.

But I am not here for the purpose of defending the action of the District commissioners, and shall not enter into any argument upon that subject further than to say that under the provision which is found in this appropriation bill if I had been one of the commissioners I should have construed the law precisely as they have construed it, and, as it seems to me, the only natural and reasonable way of construing it, and I should have exercised my judgment and discretion in allowing or not allowing the permission to put wires overhead up to the 15th day of September, for if the legislative department had intended to command them to give no permission and not to allow another wire to be put overhead from the passage of that act, it would have been the simplest and easiest method to have said so in explicit terms.

But the very form in which the clause is put shows conclusively that the legislative intent was not to prohibit from the moment of the passage of that act, but to allow the District commissioners from the time that act passed until the 15th of September to exercise their judgment and discretion in allowing or disallowing the placing of electric wires overhead.

When the joint resolution, also introduced by the Senator from Vermont, assuming absolute legislative control by legislative methods and forms of the action of the District commissioners upon this question comes up for consideration the whole subject will be open, and the Senate and the House of Representatives will give whatever instructions they may choose to the District commissioners upon this matter. But the committee, as I said before, with absolute unanimity, did not see proper to recommend the passage of a resolution simply requesting the District commissioners to withdraw or rescind the permits heretofore granted, and I am free to say, and may perhaps say without any breach of propriety or confidence, that the members of the committee present, I believe, were absolutely unanimous, if we had been acting directly upon that question, in allowing the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railroad to go on and make the experiment with the overhead wires that they propose to make in propelling the cars that they propose to put upon the line of road from Seventh street along New York avenue out to the Soldiers' Home.

The Senator from Missouri is wholly mistaken when he says that the question of cost is the only one. It is an important one, and one that doubtless has very considerable weight with the corporators who propose to construct that road, because there is a difference of quite twenty, perhaps more than twenty, thousand dollars per mile in the cost of constructing the road to be propelled by overhead or underground wires.

But there is another and very material condition affecting that question.

You may put electric wires in a conduit where the power is to be applied at one end of the line and exerted at the other end of the line. There you may completely inclose the conduit and it is open only at the end where the power is admitted and at the other where it is exerted; but in respect of propelling street cars or other moving objects the conduit must be an open slot at the top through which the power is applied on every quarter of an inch on every particle of the line, and it is absolutely true until an ascertained fact that if by any means water shall rise in that until it comes in contact with the wire in that conduit every particle of propelling power is grounded and lost for the practical purpose for which it has been obtained. It renders your power uncertain and absolutely powerless, if I may use such a phrase, whenever the atmosphere becomes exceedingly damp, perhaps not a total loss of power then, but if the water ever touches your wire then your power is absolutely gone, and in addition to the cost and under the most favorable circumstances the best electrical information based upon experiments is that there is a loss of power with the wire in the conduit of from 10 to 15 per cent. under the very best system of under-ground wires that can be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being Senate bill No. 12, the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that that bill be laid aside, and that we may take up the Chinese bill and take the vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside that the Senate may proceed with the Chinese bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I was inclined to ask the Senator from Nevada and the Senator in charge of the unfinished business to let us proceed with this matter this morning.

Mr. STEWART. I will yield after the Chinese bill is disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course the Senator will yield when he has no other object.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to submit some remarks to the Senate for a few moments in regard to the Chinese bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of he Senator from Nevada that the unfinished business be informally aid aside and that the consideration of the Chinese restriction bill be resumed. The Chair hears none.

Mr. VEST. I want to make a statement, and then the Senate, as a matter of course, can do as it pleases. I saw the secretary of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] this morning and asked him when that Senator would return to the city. I did so because, before leaving us, the Senator from Vermont had spoken to me about this identical question and expressed anxiety to be present when it was discussed, as he was the mover of the resolution referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. He seemed to assume, and I did not ask him upon what authority, that the matter would not be taken up in his absence. I asked his secretary to-day to telegraph him, unless this matter came to a vote during the morning hour, requesting him to return to the city, and I should be very glad indeed if some agreement of that sort could be had. I know very well it is said that the 15th of September is rapidly approaching and that this matter must be disposed of, and I have been informed by the president of the company that he has material on hand and is ready to put up the overhead electric wires and only waits the disposition of this question in Congress. Still I think that under the circumstances it would be better to let the matter go over for two days anyhow, until the Senator from Vermont can take charge of it. I am simply acting in loco parentis for him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has agreed to consider the Chinese restriction bill.

BENJAMIN D. LAKIN.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 979) for the relief of Benjamin D. Lakin was postponed indefinitely, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. I have spoken to the Senator who reported it. It is desired to submit additional testimony.

Mr. BATE. I have no objection to the action proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the vote indefinitely postponing the bill will be reconsidered, and it will be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11336) a supplement to an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved the 6th day of May, 1882.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass? on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. We were in the act of taking the vote when the Senate adjourned yesterday.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator from Ohio give way to allow me to call up a telegram now on the table which I offered this morning in relation to this bill and have it read to the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The telegram will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., September 6, 1888.

Hon. GEORGE HEARST, Washington:

Following resolutions were adopted at mass meeting to-night:

D. A. MACDONALD.

"Whereas the Scott anti-Chinese total-exclusion act passed the House of Representatives and now before the Senate of the United States for consideration and passage will relieve the people of the United States from the further coming of Chinese, with whom we are now too long overburdened; and

"Whereas the withdrawal of the ruinous competition with our laboring and industrial classes will be the dawn of a greater prosperity to the people of our common country and in a special degree to the entire Pacific Slope: Now, therefore,

"Be it resolved, That we, the citizens of San Francisco, in mass meeting assembled, urgently appeal to the Senate of the United States to give the act immediate and uninterrupted consideration and to pass the same.

"And be it further resolved, That the chairman and secretary of this meeting immediately forward a copy of these resolutions by telegraph to Senator HEARST for presentation to the Senate.

"Metropolitan Hall, September 5, 1888.

"D. A. MACDONALD, Chairman.

"HERMANN GUDTSTADT, Secretary."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to prolong the debate on this bill, because I think the Senate ought to be willing to wait a day or two, or two or three days, until we ascertain, in response to the inquiry sent to the President, whether the fact on which this bill rests really exists. Yesterday, after information communicated to me in an informal way that we were acting in the dark and in haste upon information that was probably groundless, that the Senate was departing from its usual orderly proceeding upon a misapprehension of facts, I introduced a resolution, which was passed yesterday morning, calling on the President to inform us whether or not there was any information of any kind whatever indicating that the treaty with China was not to be ratified.

There is a bill now before the President of the United States for his approval, passed by both Houses of Congress after full deliberation, after full examination, providing for the exclusion of Chinese laborers under the provision of that treaty. The President has not yet approved that bill. It has not yet been returned to us with his signature. Therefore an inference was drawn in my own mind that perhaps the President of the United States had information that the treaty was not ratified, and therefore that the bill before him would be nugatory and that this bill was intended to supply the defect. Hence I made no objection to it, although it was an unusual thing for the Senate of the United States to receive a bill of this importance and pass it without a reference, without consideration, without any of the forms required by our ordinary legislative proceedings; but assuming that this bill came from the executive department of the Government now in possession of an act based upon an erroneous idea, I was perfectly willing to waive the ordinary rules to meet the exigencies of the case.

I am decidedly in favor of the passage of this bill. If the Chinese Government has deliberately declined to negotiate further upon this subject, and has refused to accede to the universal demand of the American people that there shall be a restriction on this kind of immigration, then I am perfectly willing to pass a law asserting the power of the United States to regulate the coming of persons to this country, declaring who shall be kept out of it, and of passing such a bill without regard to the ordinary forms of legislation. But that fact has not been ascertained; we have no answer to the resolution of the Senate adopted yesterday. That answer will undoubtedly come to-day in the ordinary course of proceedings.

If it should appear, as I believe it will appear, that no such information has been received, that in point of fact the Chinese minister is now on his way to this country, or about to come on his way from Peru, as he is charged also with diplomatic duty, probably with the ratification, at any rate with some explanation or modification of it, then that we should hastily without regard to the ordinary usages of the Senate pass this bill would be a surprise to the whole country and to the whole civilized world.

The very fact that we have felt it to be our duty to wait and have waited and delayed action upon the subject until we could negotiate a new treaty; the very fact that the Senate through its committee had called upon the executive authorities to negotiate this treaty; that it had been negotiated and successfully negotiated only subject to two small amendments that were in harmony with the general object of the treaty and in the line of the treaty, to make that clear which was declared to be already clear, shows the importance of the question. The amendments were put on the treaty for greater safety to accomplish the object by general assent, for the purpose of making clear what perhaps was not sufficiently clear before. And now I have the information from indirect sources, not from the President of the United States or his Secretary of State, but information otherwise that is trustworthy, that the probability is no such action has been taken as has been suggested, but that the Chinese Government is still considering the proposition, although embarrassed by complications with another government, and the Chinese legation have no information at all on this subject, and the President of the United States has no information on the subject. So we are blindly, like a set of partridges, running away from a fact that has not yet occurred.

When this bill came to us from the House of Representatives, as I said in making my remarks in favor of its passage, I assumed as a matter of course that it came by the Executive authority. We had no information about it; we only knew that the House of Representatives suddenly suspended their business at the very beginning of a day's session and sent us this bill on the motion of a gentleman who was supposed to be high in favor with the Executive authorities.

Now suppose it should turn out, as I believe it will turn out, that no such information has been received, that having made a friendly offer to the Chinese Government to ratify the treaty, and having passed a law in pursuance of the treaty, expecting it to be ratified, we, without waiting to hear from that Government whether it has been ratified or not, or what action has been taken on it, whether or not they may not want some modification of the amendments or some qualification of the terms proposed—suppose we hastily pass a bill of this kind, it would be unbecoming the American Senate, and I have no right to criticise any other body of the Government. I think we are bound by the common courtesies due between nations to wait until we ascertain the action of the Chinese Government on the subject, and then I shall be prepared to act. If it should appear that this treaty is or shall be ratified, we place ourselves in the ridiculous attitude of assuming a fact that does not exist. If, on the contrary, it be not ratified, we shall have ample time then to pass a bill like this.

I do not care to be embarrassed about voting on this bill, and I appeal to the Senate to let the matter stand over a day or two until we ascertain the facts. No harm can result to the people of California from a short delay. No Chinaman can be shipped to this country unless he is now on his way. There is no haste about it. Suppose a dozen Chinamen should land on a vessel within a day or two, or within the next week, what difference would it make to the great 60,000,000 of people we have in this country? I do not like to see the Congress of the United States rush pell-mell like a herd of buffalos, at the fire of a single shot, by some rumor that may prove to be false. What harm can come? None whatever.

I hope, therefore, and I will submit the motion, that this matter be laid aside informally so that we can ascertain what information can be communicated to us by the executive authorities. I do this in no hostility to the bill, but with a desire to see it passed and not wishing at all to engage in a political race, if that is the object. I do not think it is worthy of us. I resent the imputation that we are governed by any desire to run a race for political ends. I do not believe that that is the feeling which actuates the Senate, and resent it. I think the proper way is for the Senate to wait and see whether there is any danger; whether this treaty is to be rejected. If it is to be rejected, then the bill stands upon the table, and in a single moment upon hearing from the President of the United States that the treaty is not to be ratified we may pass the bill; but to do it until that time comes, it seems to me, as I said before, is unbecoming the dignity and good order of the Senate of the United States. Until that is done, as I intimated the other day, I shall not vote for this or any other bill, however important or however good it may appear to be, or however desirable to any portion of our people it may be to pass it. They can wait a little while and have us do the thing in an orderly manner.

I submit the motion that the bill be laid over.

[A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the further consideration of this bill be informally postponed. Will the Senator name the time?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I leave it to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Informally laid aside.

Mr. STEWART. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada objects.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, when the vote was taken last evening, just at the adjournment of the Senate, I did not vote, although in my seat. I did not vote, for the reason that I had not anticipated that the vote would then be taken, and I did not wish to vote at all, either in favor of or against the bill, until I had had an opportunity to express the reasons which would govern my vote.

If a vote is now pressed upon this bill I shall vote for it, and I desire to state the reasons, and I desire also to state some reasons why I shall do it under protest, for I do not intend that any action of mine shall be misunderstood or misrepresented.

I do not like the way this bill has come before Congress, and I want to say so as emphatically as I know how. In May last the Senate of the United States advised and consented to a treaty which had been negotiated with China and communicated to the Senate by the President. We were told by those representing the Pacific coast, and we have heard it over and over again, that the treaty as it came to the Senate was not satisfactory and would not accomplish the object in view, namely, the exclusion of Chinese laborers from this country. Being told that, the Senate amended the treaty in a way which was proposed by the representatives of the Pacific coast and in a manner which they told us would be entirely satisfactory and would have the effect of preventing Chinese laborers from coming to this country in competition with our home labor. The treaty was so amended and passed the Senate, I think, without a dissenting voice, which I may say because the injunction of secrecy has been removed.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to correct the Senator. I for one voted against the treaty.

Mr. PLATT. Then I was mistaken as to that. Will the Senator tell me how many voted against the treaty?

Mr. TELLER. I think perhaps three or four, not over three or four, perhaps only two. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] and myself voted against the treaty.

Mr. MITCHELL. I not only voted against the treaty, but I spoke against it.

Mr. PLATT. Practically there was unanimity. It was unanimously reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and certainly as I understood at the time was satisfactory to the President and to the Senators representing the Pacific coast. Following that treaty the Senate passed a bill on the 8th of August, 1888, to carry into effect the provisions of that treaty when ratifications should be exchanged—a bill which, I think, received the unanimous support of the Senate. In that I think I am not mistaken—a bill which I approved and which I still approve.

Now, I wish to take the time of the Senate for a moment to call attention to the provisions of the treaty and the bill, to show how far the Senate has progressed in the direction of the accomplishment of this object which is so dear not only to the people of the Pacific coast but to the great body, as I believe, of the laboring men of this country. Article I of the treaty provided as negotiated as follows:

The high contracting parties agree that for a period of twenty years, beginning with the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, the coming, except under the conditions hereinafter specified, of Chinese laborers to the United States shall be absolutely prohibited.

To which the Senate added this amendment—

And this prohibition shall extend to the return of Chinese laborers who are not now in the United States, whether holding return certificates under existing laws or not.

Article II contained the limitations under which a Chinese laborer who had left this country under the provisions of its laws, with the certificate issued by law in his pocket allowing him to return, might be permitted to come back, and I will put it all into my remarks which I am making without reading in full, simply saying that it provided that the Chinese laborer who had taken a certificate, as was provided by the laws of the United States he might take, which entitled him to return, should not return unless he left behind him here a lawful wife, child, or parent in the United States, or property therein of the value of $1,000, or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement. Article II of the treaty as sent to the Senate was as follows:

ARTICLE II.

The preceding article shall not apply to the return to the United States of any Chinese laborer who has a lawful wife, child, or parent in the United States or property therein of the value of $1,000, or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement. Nevertheless, every such Chinese laborer shall, before leaving the United States, deposit, as a condition of his return, with the collector of customs of the district from which he departs, a full description in writing of his family, or property, or debts, as aforesaid, and shall be furnished by said collector with such certificate of his right to return under this treaty as the laws of the United States may now or hereafter prescribe and not inconsistent with the provisions of this treaty; and should the written description aforesaid be proved to be false, the right of return thereunder, or of continued residence after return, shall in each case be forfeited. And such right of return to the United States shall be exercised within one year from the date of leaving the United States; but such right of return to the United States may be extended for an additional period, not to exceed one year, in cases where, by reason of sickness or other cause of disability beyond his control, such Chinese laborer shall be rendered unable sooner to return, which fact shall be fully reported to the Chinese consul at the port of departure, and by him certified, to the satisfaction of the collector of the port at which such Chinese subject shall land in the United States. And no such Chinese laborer shall be permitted to enter the United States by land or sea without producing to the proper officer of the customs the return certificate herein required.

To the text of this article, as negotiated, we added this clause:

And no such Chinese laborer shall be permitted to enter the United States by land or sea without producing to the proper officer of the customs the return certificate herein required.

The act which we passed on the 8th day of August, 1888, by its first section (the whole act taking effect from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty), made it unlawful for any Chinese person, whether a subject of China or of any other power, to enter the United States except as therein provided. It provided that Chinese officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for pleasure or curiosity, should be permitted to enter the United States, having first obtained the permission of the Chinese Government, or other government of which they might at the time be citizens or subjects, and prescribed a great number of conditions attaching to that certificate, so as to make it impossible that any person from China except officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for pleasure or curiosity should ever thereafter land in the United States.

It provided also that the provisions of the act should apply to all persons of the Chinese race or the subjects of China or other foreign power, except Chinese diplomatic or consular officers or their attendants, and that the words "Chinese laborers" wherever used in the act should be construed to mean skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining.

It provided that after the passage of the act no Chinese laborer in the United States should be permitted, after having left, to return thereto except under the conditions stated in the following sections, 6 and 7, which are in these words:

SEC. 6. That no Chinese laborer within the purview of the preceding section shall be permitted to return to the United States unless he has a lawful wife, child, or parent in the United States, or property therein of the value of $1,000, or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement. The marriage of such wife must have taken place at least a year prior to the application of the laborer for a permit to return to the United States, and must have been followed by the continuous cohabitation of the parties as man and wife.

If the right to return be claimed on the ground of property or of debts, it must appear that the property is bona fide and not colorably acquired for the purpose of evading this act, or that the debts are unascertained and unsettled, and not promissory notes or other similar acknowledgments of ascertained liability.

SEC. 7. That a Chinese person claiming the right to be permitted to leave the United States and return thereto on any of the grounds stated in the foregoing section shall apply to the collector of customs of the district from which he wishes to depart at least a month prior to the time of his departure, and shall make on oath before the said collector a full statement descriptive of his family, or property, or debts, as the case may be, and shall furnish to said collector such proofs of the facts entitling him to return as shall be required by the rules and regulations prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of the Treasury, and for any false swearing in relation thereto he shall incur the penalties of perjury. He shall also permit the collector to take a full description of his person, which description the collector shall retain and mark with a number. And if the collector, after hearing the proofs and investigating all the circumstances of the case, shall decide to issue a certificate of return, he shall, at such time and place as he may designate, sign and give to the person applying a certificate containing the number of the description last aforesaid, which shall be the sole evidence given to such person of his right to return. If this last-named certificate be transferred, it shall become void, and the person to whom it was given shall forfeit his right to return to the United States. The right to return under the said certificate shall be limited to one year; but it may be extended for an additional period, not to exceed a year, in cases where, by reason of sickness or other cause of disability beyond his control, the holder thereof shall be rendered unable sooner to return, which facts shall be fully reported to and investigated by the consular representative of the United States at the port or place from which such laborer departs for the United States, and certified by such representative of the United States to the satisfaction of the collector of customs at the port where such Chinese person shall seek to land in the United States, such certificate to be delivered by said representative to the master of the vessel on which he departs for the United States. And no Chinese laborer shall be permitted to re-enter the United States without producing to the proper officer of the customs at the port of such entry the return certificate herein required. A Chinese laborer possessing a certificate under this section shall be admitted to the United States only at the port from which he departed therefrom, and no Chinese person, except Chinese diplomatic or consular officers, and their attendants, shall be permitted to enter the United States except at the ports of San Francisco, Portland, Oregon, Boston, New York, New Orleans, Port Townsend, or such other ports as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The treaty was agreed to by the Senate, I think, on the 7th day of May, and, as I understand, has been submitted to the Chinese authorities for the exchange of ratifications. The bill, after having passed the Senate, went to the House of Representatives, was concurred in by the House, and on the 1st day of September, 1888, was taken to the President of the United States for his approval, and remains before him at the present time. That was last Saturday. With that bill, which if the treaty is to be ratified by the Chinese Government goes as far as any human being in the United States has asked Congress to go in the exclusion of Chinese laborers—with that bill passed by both Houses, now in the hands of the President of the United States for approval or rejection, there comes here another act, based upon the assumption that this treaty is not to be ratified. As I say, the bill passed by both Houses of Congress was delivered to the President of the United States last Saturday, the 1st day of September. On last Monday, the 3d day of September, there came to us from the House of Representatives the bill now under consideration.

If as every Senator here thinks, if as the whole country believes, the bill under consideration emanated from the executive department, and was started in hot haste immediately after the laying before the President of the United States of a bill passed by Congress upon the subject, it seems to me to be an executive interference with the legislative branch of the Government, and I am bound in my character as a Senator to make that remark.

I want to say one thing more. If there has been any notice received by the executive branch of this Government to the effect that this treaty has been rejected, whether officially or unofficially, that notice has been studiously kept and concealed from every Republican member of the Senate and from every Republican.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to interrupt him for one moment?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I do it to say that if any such information, official or unofficial, has been received, so far as I know it has also studiously been kept from every member of the Senate upon this side of the Chamber. I know of no ground on which the Senator has authority to make the remark that the Executive is responsible in any way for this bill or that any Executive Department is.

Mr. PLATT. I can not say that this bill is written upon the paper of the executive department. I know it is generally believed in both Houses of this Congress that it is. I can not say that the most potential man in the Democratic national committee in the management of this campaign came from the White House to the Capitol with this bill; but it is generally believed in this Chamber and throughout the Union. If there has been no official notice or unofficial intimation that this treaty has been rejected or is to be rejected by the Chinese Government, why this hot haste to override the act now lying before the Executive for his approval, and to pass this bill, which under such circumstances would be a direct insult to a nation with whom at least we are desirous of continuing friendly commercial relations? Is this a vote-catching performance? Has it come to this that public office is to be prostituted for Democratic electioneering purposes? And if not, what other reason is there for this thrusting in in this untimely way of this bill upon the attention of Congress?

It is considerations like these which lead me to say that I can not vote for this bill except under protest. If this treaty is to be rejected, not to be ratified by China, if there has been even an unofficial intimation or communication of that fact received by the Executive or by the State Department and we can be informed of that fact, I would willingly vote for this bill. I am going to vote for it, after what I have said, anyway, if the vote is pressed before we can get this information.

I am not going to assume that a potent member of the Democratic national committee, even, has thrust this bill before this Congress when a bill which we had passed was lying before the President, and when there was no intimation received by the President or by the State Department that the treaty which that bill was to carry into effect would not be ratified. I am not going in my position as a Senator to act upon the assumption that this act as it comes here before us is a purely electioneering dodge, coming to us from the source from whence it started, wherever that source may be, in hot haste solely in order that the Democratic party may thereby commend itself to that class of our citizens who are excited upon the question of whether Chinese laborers are coming here to displace American labor.

This bill being here, being bound as a Senator, in spite of all the circumstances which point to other conclusions, to assume that the Executive and the State Department and the Democratic national committee have some knowledge which has not been communicated to us, that this treaty is not to be ratified, I am going to vote for the bill, and I am going to do so because I am heartily and sincerely in favor of prohibiting and preventing any immigration into this country of a character which we ought not to receive. When I voted against the law of 1882 to exclude Chinese laborers, I put it upon the ground that it was unnecessary, and that it was improper plainly to violate a treaty of the United States, and, that I might not be misunderstood and misrepresented, although I have since been misunderstood and misrepresented, I took occasion to explain my position on this subject of improper immigration into this country at that time, and I read now from what I said in 1882:

> My opposition to this bill shall not be misrepresented; no false issue shall be raised without my protest. I say, therefore, that I am willing, and I put on record my willingness, to vote for any law we may properly pass, any law we can pass without violation of treaty obligation, to the end that the labor market of this country shall not be oversupplied by immigration from any quarter; that there shall be no undue and ruinous competition in labor; that honest labor shall not be dishonored or degraded anywhere; that the standard of labor shall be fairly remunerative everywhere; that the man who is willing to do honest work with hand or brain, or both, shall receive wages enough to enable him to live respectably, to educate his children, and respect himself. I believe in the dignity of labor and the dignity of the laborer. I believe that work ennobles a man, and that it is the primal law and condition of successful civilization.

As I believed then I believe now. I did not believe then that it was necessary in order to protect the labor of this country from ruinous and improper competition with Chinese labor to violate a treaty in a law which we might pass.

But still further, that there may be no doubt where I stand on this question of immigration, I desire to say this: I hold first to the right of expatriation. Does any Senator dispute that right? I hold that a citizen of any country on the face of this earth has a right to leave that country and to transfer his allegiance to another country with the consent of the government to which he endeavors to transfer his allegiance. That right, I think, is too sacred in American history to be denied or impeached or in any way invaded.

I hold just as firmly to our right not to receive a man who may thus expatriate himself and desire to come to this country as I do to his right to come with our consent. I hold that we have a right to so regulate, restrain, restrict, or prohibit immigration into this country, as that our own country and our own people shall not suffer by that immigration, as that the character of our own people shall not be in any sense degraded or suffer by such immigration. In the third place, I hold that we ought to receive any person who thus desires to leave a foreign country and come to our shores and who can comply with certain conditions which are necessary to be complied with in order that our civilization, our labor, and the character of our people shall be in no sense lessened, interfered with, or degraded.

If, then, a man coming from another country is honest, is reputable, is able to take care of himself, is healthy, is the head of a family, is of capacity to understand our system of government, and is sincerely desirous of casting in his lot with us and ultimately becoming a citizen of this Government, I hold we have no right to exclude him. But if on the other hand that person belongs to the criminal, or to the pauper, or the diseased or vicious class, we ought to exclude him. We have no room here for that class of immigrants. We have no room for criminals, paupers, diseased, vicious people in all our wide domain. We ought also to exclude people who have no sympathy with us or with our form of government or with our institutions.

The very clause in our statute of naturalization is a guide to us in this respect. Before an alien can become a naturalized citizen he must make it appear to the satisfaction of the court admitting him to citizenship that during his residence in the United States "he has behaved as a man of good moral character, is attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same." I would not admit to these shores, if I could apply the test, a single individual who had not capacity enough to understand something of our system of government, and to have an aspiration for the liberty and independence and the dignity which a man may acquire and achieve under our system of government. No anarchists, no communists, no persons, from wherever they may come, who do not come here imbued with the principles first laid down, in the history of the world, in that glorious Declaration of Independence should be permitted to come, if I could apply the individual test which would keep them away.

Then, Mr. President, I would protect the great labor interest in this country. I think the future prosperity of this nation depends upon the protection of that interest. I think the perpetuity of republican institutions depends upon the protection of that interest. I think the manhood of American citizenship depends upon the protection of that interest; and I would neither by a law passed here nor by immigration permit that interest in any way to be invaded or degraded. And so if I had it in my power I would keep out from this country, prevent the landing upon our shores, of any man from foreign countries, no matter what the country was, imported to come in competition with our laborers at a rate of wages lower than those paid to American citizens.

I would prevent all encouraged, all stimulated or assisted immigration of laborers into this country. And I would go one step further—and that is what enables me to say that I will vote for this bill—I would keep out from this country not only the laborers of any clime or country who come here and enter into competition with American laborers without having a spark of sympathy with our institutions or the capacity to understand them, and without the intention of becoming citizens, but I would also keep out any class of persons from anywhere on the face of the earth who by any reason are incapable of assimilation with our people.

I did not believe in the start and I do not believe now that all Chinamen are so incapable of understanding our system of government or so incapable of assimilation with our citizens that they may not come here and become citizens of the United States. I do not take much stock in this idea that they should not be permitted to come here because they belong to a particular race; but I have come to see and believe, and in that respect my sentiments have somewhat changed, that the great bulk of the population of China, and especially that portion of it that will come here to enter into competition with our laborers, is of a character which is incapable of assimilation with us in any form, incapable of having the aspirations which an American citizen must have in order to make him a real sovereign of the Republic. I have come to believe that, and I am so thoroughly satisfied of this that I have become willing to exclude all Chinese laborers from the United States.

There is another reason for doing so. Admitting that it were possible to find a skilled Chinese laborer or a more intelligent individual among the class whom, on the general principles which I have stated, it would scarcely be fair to exclude from the United States, yet I am told it is impossible, and I believe it to be impossible, to prevent the coming of Chinamen whom we all agree should be excluded from our midst, who should not come here and degrade the citizenship already here of which we are so proud, that it is impossible to keep those out I say, unless we exclude all laborers.

I believe that to be true. I believe that our laws have been evaded, violated; that we have been cheated in this matter; that when we attempted to place restrictions upon the class of people that come here we were cheated by having the class of people come here that we did not intend to have come in the place of those whom we were willing to receive. Therefore it is from the necessity of the case that I am and for years have been willing to go all lengths which it was necessary to go in order to exclude from coming to this country that class of people whom we can not receive on equal terms of citizenship, whom it is impossible for us to receive and still protect our laborers at home, whom it is impossible for us to receive and not degrade our citizenship.

So I have voted for the acts which I have been told it was necessary to pass in order to exclude this dangerous element, this uncivilizing element, from our community, and so I am led now to vote for anything that is necessary. I put my vote for this bill solely on the ground that I can not assume that there is no necessity for it. If the treaty which we agreed to here is to be ratified by the Chinese Government, and if the bill which we have already passed to carry the treaty into effect is to be approved by the President of the United States, I can not see the necessity for this bill. But I will not, as a Senator, assume that this bill has no necessity behind it, and that it is simply and purely an electioneering trick, a performance on the part of the Democratic party and its high officials to catch votes in certain quarters of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not like to have this debate go on upon the supposition that the Chinese Government have acted with entire fairness in this matter.

In 1886 a bill was passed through the Senate that would have had a tendency to retard their coming to the United States, and the Administration undertook to negotiate with China, and a bill was also reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, at the present session, which would very much limit their coming. But the treaty came here, and I was in favor of accepting the treaty or anything that would make progress, and after the Committee on Foreign Relations had amended it, as was stated in the Senate by some members of the committee—I do not recollect who—that there was no difficulty about those amendments, that the Chinese Government would accept them; in fact, the State Department, as I was informed, understood the meaning of the original treaty to be the same as the amended treaty, and on the 7th of May last, four months ago to-morrow, the Senate ratified the treaty with those amendments.

During those four months, instead of the Chinese Government acting upon the treaty promptly, we have had a rush of Chinese, a greater rush than usual, and they are acting in bad faith about it anyway, no matter how you fix it. They know very well the desire and purpose of the United States, and they hold this treaty back four months and rush Chinamen in, and they will continue to do it as long as you allow them. They have a great many ways to avoid our laws; they are very cunning.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Nevada seems to be in charge of this bill. I desire to ask him whether he has any information that is reliable or official to the effect that the Chinese Government has rejected the treaty.

Mr. STEWART. We have no information that they have not. All the information I have is from the public prints that they have rejected it.

Mr. BROWN. I ask if there is any official information.

Mr. STEWART. I do not know.

Mr. PLUMB. There is one thing to be said about that. I am acting on the source from which this legislation comes. It is stated in the leading Democratic paper in the United States this morning that it comes directly from the hands of the President through the intervention of a member of the House of Representatives. I refer to the New York World.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Kansas if he is willing to act upon a statement sent in that way when he could telegraph to the executive department and in three minutes get the information.

Mr. PLUMB. As to that, silence is said to give consent. The President of the United States has sent this bill down in the shape of a message to the House of Representatives. We take it from that body representing the Administration. We take it from the hands of his trusted counselor, and as far as I am concerned under all the circumstances, after waiting a couple of days, and there being no sign given out, as I have stated, silence gives consent. It is expected that it is practically an Administration measure based upon something that the Administration knew, or if not based on what they do know, on what they ought to know.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask him whether as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations he has any information as to the rejection of the treaty?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly not. On the contrary, I sent a respectful request to the President yesterday, and hoped it would be answered last night or to-day, to inform the Senate whether or not there was any official communication. My information, though not official, was directly to the opposite effect. That information came to me from a very distinguished citizen of the United States, who having had business with the Chinese legation told me he believed, from the information he got, that the Chinese minister was on his way here. No objection was made to the amendments to the treaty, so far as he knows; no objection of any kind has ever come to the Government of the United States; no suggestion that these amendments were objected to. On the contrary, the minister himself assented to them at the time they were offered. It is presumed, as a matter of course, that the treaty will be ratified. Everybody knows that the Chinese Government is slow in its operations; there is a great deal of red tape there, more probably than in any of the European governments. There is no intimation that I have seen anywhere in print or communicated to us verbally or in any way that this treaty will not be ratified.

The President of the United States has the right under the Constitution to send to us a message in writing. We received a message to-day, a short time ago, which I understand is about some unimportant matter. We can have a message at any time from the President. If we wait a day or two the ordinary communication can be made. The Secretary of State will no doubt give an answer to our call. All I ask is that this bill shall be postponed until we can know whether or not there has been any information received, official or unofficial, in reference to this treaty, and not put ourselves in the attitude of passing a law abrogating a treaty, as we all concede this does, as I know it does, as I believe we have a right to do, while the other contracting party is deliberating upon the subject, while it is acting upon the treaty, without any information from the executive authority.

I am not so well informed as my friend from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], who is willing to take a newspaper account of what a member of Congress did as evidence that the President of the United States had communicated to us his opinion that the treaty was not to be ratified. I do not believe in that mode of communication. The Senate of the United States never has received a message from the President of the United States, from the beginning of its history to this hour, except in the ordinary form, in writing, in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States. We have no information, and I feel free to say in reply to the question of the Senator from Georgia that no communication of any kind has come to the President of the United States in regard to this treaty.

I believe that to be the fact. The whole of our action heretofore has been based on the assumption because a distinguished member of the House of Representatives brought a bill in, got it through the House, and sent it here, that it was with the sanction of the Administration. Certainly we ought not to be satisfied with that. Suppose the President should veto the bill he has before him on the ground that we have passed a law which abrogates the very treaty which that bill proposes to execute; we should be in a hole then, in a very embarrassing position.

Mr. PLUMB. Who will be in a hole?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate of the United States, when it undertakes to act upon rumors or upon inferences, upon probabilities, when it has asked a plain question to be answered in a plain way, and which has not yet been responded to, would be acting like a set of schoolboys.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator what reason he thinks there is, the President having had this resolution for some time, why he has not sent any information about the treaty one way or the other? What is the reason the President does not answer the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. The resolution was only sent to him yesterday, and I think in due form an answer ought to come to-day.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose he might send a boy over. It would not take more than half an hour. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLUMB. It is incredible to me that this bill could have been introduced in the House of Representatives and passed there, coming from the source it did, without the proceeding having been with the consent and practical connivance of the Administration. When I say that I speak with all due respect. I have no doubt in the world it was on the suggestion of the President of the United States, and that he believed a measure of this kind had become necessary by reason of information he had of the rejection of the Chinese treaty.

I do not take into special account that the State Department had no information on the subject, because in what I read from the New York World of to-day—and nobody doubts its friendly relations to the Administration or its inspiration in regard to matters of high Administration policy—there was stronger evidence of verity than any knowledge of the State Department would have implied. The general title to the article I have mentioned is:

THE KITCHEN CABINET—THE RIGHT HONORABLE WILLIAM L. SCOTT, K. C.—THE MOST INFLUENTIAL MAN IN WASHINGTON—HIS SHARE IN THE RECENT RETALIATORY MESSAGE AND HIS ANTI-CHINESE BILL.

Then it proceeds:

The bill introduced in the House yesterday relating to the Chinese was the work of the kitchen cabinet. Mr. Scott brought that bill from the White House.

Not from some kitchen or shanty adjacent to the White House, but from the White House itself.

Mr. PAYNE. Is that in the correspondence of the World?

Mr. PLUMB. The correspondence of the New York World. It continues:

It seems that he read in a newspaper last Sunday morning that the Chinese Government had rejected the pending treaty.

So that it goes back to the best of all sources of information, a newspaper.

This is all the information that the kitchen cabinet or the House had upon the subject.

A distinction will be observed there, a lack of information from other than newspaper sources on the part of the kitchen cabinet and the House.

A member of the House Foreign Relations Committee, and a Democrat at that—

Which makes it more binding still, being a Democrat—[laughter]— told me this morning that he had been to the State Department and had received there no information upon the subject.

That was of no consequence, as will appear when I read further to the effect that the State Department knew nothing about it. That makes it more certain to me that the President knew all about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. Bayard was out of town and had not been consulted concerning this important action. The first information that he could have received on the subject was from the morning papers.

The best possible source of information, as I said a moment ago, that any one can have.

When Mr. SCOTT presented the matter in the House it was generally reported about that it was an Administration measure and that the bill was written upon Administration paper.

Of course the last part about stationery is of importance. No reform Administration could, of course, have any loose sheets of paper lying around. [Laughter.]

They must have had just the amount necessary to carry on the public business, and of course if that bill came down written upon paper of the Administration brand, used only for the transaction of executive business, which, of course, could only be transacted upon official stationery by this reform Administration, and of course there is a practical visé of the bill, the sign manual of the White House upon it.

The motive for this extraordinary haste is so transparent as to appear like a bit of comedy. Senator BUTLER, who denounced the haste in the Senate yesterday with which this bill was rushed through the House, is much more of a statesman than a partisan.

I detect the colored gentleman in the wood-pile right there. [Laughter.] The House of Representatives put it through under the inspiration of a wink it got from the White House. It came down there at the hands of the kitchen cabinet; it was written on Administration stationery, and with all the surroundings and concomitants, of course, of an Administration move, and the House held its breath and put it through without winking, and it was hoped that the Senate, which is said to be a conservative body and governed by traditions and all that sort of thing, would probably go into secret session on the bill or would hesitate about it, or shy at it like a horse that was partially blind and did not exactly understand the character and size of the object in front of him, and therefore some credit come to the Administration and the House by reason of promptness. But the Senate appeared in as much of a hurry as the House had been, and was proceeding with the tumultuous haste to follow the example of the House—being desirous, of course, of obliging the Administration. This was not counted on by the Administration or the kitchen cabinet, and therefore it was that one of the principal representatives of the Administration on this floor endeavored to interpose in order that the Senate should not get its work in so quick as then seemed probable in order that the country might have full opportunity to observe the dilatoriness of the Senate as compared with the haste of the House in passing this very important measure.

He—

That is the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], and I am sorry he is not here to hear the compliment which I pay him as the leader of the Administration forces—

He saw very clearly the lack of wisdom of such a course.

Certainly from the Democratic standpoint it was exceedingly unwise that the Republican Senate should make such haste to pass this bill.

The State Department has cable communication with China, but has received no word of the rejection of the treaty, and therefore was not at all pleased with the position in which the action of the House has placed it.

The article proceeds:

It is not the first time that Mr. Bayard has been ignored by the kitchen cabinet.

Now the phrase "the kitchen cabinet" becomes more comprehensive. It embraces not only the man who sits at the head of the table with his cabinet ministers around him, who may be advisers or may be puppets, but also the President himself, and so I am prepared for what follows:

The retaliation measure of the President was the direct result of Mr. SCOTT's suggestions.

I do not need to dilate upon the relations of Mr. SCOTT to the Administration, and I mention his name only because it occurs in the article from which I read. I do not dilate upon his relation to the Administration at all. That is known of all men. That is about as important a relation as was occupied by the traditional Captain Scott to that celebrated coon that came down when he learned who was aiming a musket at him. [Laughter.]

The message was not approved by Mr. Bayard—

Which, of course, is of no possible consequence—indeed, it can be said that he was not consulted. Most men occupying a high position as Mr. Bayard has would leave the Cabinet after being ignored in two such important matters. But Mr. Bayard will not resign—

That I regard as entirely true—

the members of the Cabinet are so thoroughly accustomed to being ignored by the President in all matters of public policy that they would not dream of showing resentment.

It will be observed, in the first place, that the President and the kitchen cabinet, or the kitchen cabinet and the President, not to raise a question between them or to put one in the front and the other in the rear, have just done this thing by themselves and that is all there is about it. Nothing in the world could be plainer than that it is an Administration measure from the title of the bill to the period with which its contents are closed; not a measure of a member of the Cabinet—I mean the regular statutory Cabinet—but of the kitchen cabinet; not the work of the statutory Cabinet, not the work of one of those superfluous gentlemen who sit around the table and hear what the President has to say and execute his commands if he chooses to trust them rather than some person outside picked up for the occasion, but the Administratiom itself, kitchen cabinet and all. [Laughter.]

There is a further sentence here of this letter which has some relation to the subject-matter, and which I will read:

Mr. SCOTT has now made arrangements to create popularity on the Pacific coast.

That is another evidence, I think, that this was the inspiration of the Administration, because that is, of course, what they are trying to do, and properly enough, for we are trying to do the same thing; but the Administration of course has got the advantage, because it can act more promptly and more rapidly than we can, and has got the information probably which we are only guessing at.

This was the meaning of the bill of yesterday. It was this which galloped it through the House without debate or consideration.

Of course if it is going to come to nothing, if it is going to be vetoed, if it is going to be shown some of these days that it was not necessary because the Chinese Government has ratified our treaty, where will the votes on the Pacific coast be that the Administration is expecting to get? We should have done a vain thing in the way of helping the Administration. But they know what they are about. The kitchen cabinet has moved upon information that this bill is necessary in order that it may make popularity for the Administration on the Pacific coast, and, of course, it can only make popularity on the Pacific coast from the fact that it has a good foundation.

For many weeks the House has been able to do nothing. Whenever any legislation has come up there have been always enough objecting members to withdraw and break a quorum. The passage of this measure yesterday was the first bill of any importance which the House has been able to vote upon for some time. The Republicans could have broken the quorum yesterday, but they, too, were as anxious as the Democrats to make votes on the Pacific coast, and after the potential whisper went about that the bill was from the White House there was not a single objection.

It seems to have affected Republicans and Democrats alike. That potential whisper that went out, not from the State Department, not from the Attorney-General's office, not from the Post-Office Department, but from the White House, through the medium of the White House, settled it.

Now, Mr. President, I submit to my doubting friend from Ohio that while he is anxious to get a glimpse of the official document with the signature of the prime minister of China in tea-box characters at the bottom of it in order to make perfectly sure that he is on solid ground (he could not decipher the signature if he saw it) [laughter], and it would not be half as plain as the blazed way I have shown him between the Capitol and the White House. He certainly must be convinced, unless it would take one risen from the dead to convince him, that this measure is based on information which the President himself has, which has made him desirous of getting votes on the Pacific coast by having it passed, that we are perfectly warranted in going ahead and passing the bill, and in addition to all the marks and blazes pointing the way plainly, we ought to know, at least we ought to feel that assurance in the good judgment, in the judiciousness, and in the devotion to the public service of the President of the United States that he would not allow Congress to go on for three whole days debating a measure which was based upon false information which he had the means of correcting.

I have not the slightest doubt in the world that somewhere concealed about the clothes of the President of the United States is that identical dispatch which my friend from Ohio wants to see. [Laughter.] I am willing to go ahead without seeing it, and if it was here I could not read it anyhow, no more than he could.

So, sir, it seems to me that the Senate, without partisan discussion, with the light before it, ought to go ahead rapidly. The agreement between the kitchen cabinet and the head of the Administration that this bill should be passed we should promptly ratify.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, while I have no authority to speak for the Administration, judging from the character of this measure I deny that it is an Administration measure or a Republican measure. I suppose it is intended to stand upon its merits. In the House of Representatives it was introduced by a distinguished Democrat, and it passed the Democratic House I believe with great unanimity, both parties voting for it. The bill came here and was taken charge of, and is now in his charge, by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], who is a distinguished Republican. If it were a Democratic measure it ought to be under the control of a Democratic Senator in this branch of Congress.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator pardon a suggestion there?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLUMB. It appeared from the remarks which I read, coupled with the fact all of us know, that it was brought to the other House by a member of what is called in the terse expression of the country the K. C., to wit, that is to say, namely, the Kitchen Cabinet. I do not believe there is any member of that cabinet on this floor. In consequence of the absence of some one to take charge of it here, that potential whisper by which it was put afloat in the other House is therefore lacking.

Mr. BROWN. I think the Senate has laughed all it can afford to laugh at that rather trite jest of my friend from Kansas about a kitchen cabinet.

I repudiate the idea that this is an Administration measure, and prefer to treat it upon its merits. I think in some respects the bill is a very good one. In other respects it very seriously needs amendment; and I propose to offer an amendment, to come in at the end of the first section, which I shall read for information:

Provided, That this act shall not apply to any Chinese laborer resident of the United States who has departed therefrom with the certificate of identity provided for under the treaty by the laws of the United States, and who is now absent, and who shall have sailed from China or other foreign country for the United States, and who shall be upon the ocean on his return at the date of the passage of this act.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the bill in its present shape operates a very great hardship in the class of cases provided for by my amendment. A Chinaman living in San Francisco, having a wife and children, as some of them have, knowing that under the provisions of the treaty between the United States and China and under the statutes of the United States he had a perfect right to depart from the United States and visit China for business or pleasure, and having complied with all the requisites of the law, and having obtained the certificate of identity required by the statute which guarantied his right to return, he may now be on a trip abroad intending to return home immediately, and not doubting his right to return, and he may have engaged his passage on the steamer, and before this bill becomes a law or before the people or the Government of China know that any such bill has been introduced, he may have sailed for the United States, or he may have sailed ten days or two weeks ago, and may be within twenty-four hours of the Golden Gate at the mouth of the San Joaquin River at San Francisco when the bill is passed and signed by the President of the United States.

But if the bill becomes a law he would be met by an officer of the United States, who would inform him that notwithstanding he had wife and children and property in San Francisco, and may have lived there twenty years, and notwithstanding he left home with the guaranty of both governments that he should return on his certificate, that the Congress of the United States, without giving either him or the Chinese Government any previous notice, has passed a law forbidding his return, and that he can not put his foot upon land or see his family, but he must return to China. Doubtless there will be a number of such cases, and it seems to me to be not only a great hardship, but a cruelty and an outrage that no existing public sentiment nor any political exigency can justify.

Let us look a moment to the treaty stipulations between the United States and China. What is known as the Burlingame treaty was ratified on the 28th day of July, 1868. In the fifth article of that treaty it is provided that—

The United States of America, and the Emperor of China, cordially recognize the inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects, respectively, from the one country to the other for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents.

In the sixth article of the same treaty it is provided that—

Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation; and reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. But nothing herein contained shall be held to confer naturalization upon citizens of the United States in China, nor upon the subjects of China in the United States.

These provisions are very strong and very pointed. The two governments recognize by this treaty the inalienable right of man to change his home and his allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from the one country to the other for the purposes of curiosity or trade or as permanent residents.

And to the citizens and subjects of each the treaty guaranties all the rights of citizens and subjects of the most favored nation.

But I am aware that this treaty has been changed and modified by agreement of both governments. On the 17th day of November, 1880, the Government of the United States and the Emperor of China entered into an amendatory treaty, by the first section of which it is provided that—

Whenever in the opinion of the Government of the United States the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States or their residence therein affects or threatens to affect the interest of that country, or to endanger the good order of the said country, or of any locality within the territory thereof, the Government of China agrees that the Government of the United States may regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence, but may not absolutely prohibit it. The limitation or suspension shall be reasonable, and shall apply only to Chinese who may go to the United States as laborers, other classes not being included in the limitation. Legislation taken in regard to Chinese laborers will be of such a character only as is necessary to enforce the regulation, limitation, and suspension of immigration, and immigrants shall not be subject to personal maltreatment or abuse.

By the second section of the same treaty it is provided that—

Chinese subjects, whether proceeding to the United States as teachers, students, merchants, or from curiosity, together with their body and household servants and Chinese laborers who are now in the United States, shall be allowed to go and come of their own free will and accord, and shall be accorded all the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are accorded to citizens or subjects of the most favored nation.

Article III of the same treaty provides that—

If Chinese laborers or Chinese of any other class, now either permanently or temporarily residing in the territory of the United States, meet with maltreatment at the hands of any other persons, the Government of the United States will exert all its powers to devise measures for their protection, and to secure to them the same rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions as may be enjoyed by citizens or subjects of the most favored nation, and to which they are entitled by treaty.

Thus you will see, Mr. President, that the Chinese Government agreed to a modification of the Burlingame treaty by the treaty of 1880, by which the Government of the United States is authorized in case of Chinese laborers to regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence, but may not absolutely prohibit it. The limitation or suspension shall be reasonable and shall apply only to the Chinese who may go to the United States as laborers, other classes not being included in the limitation. And that legislation, taken in regard to Chinese laborers, will be only such as is necessary to enforce the regulation, limitation, and suspension of immigration. You will also observe that laborers who are in the United States at the time of the ratification of the treaty of 1880 shall be allowed to go and come of their own free will and accord, and there shall be accorded to them all the privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are accorded to the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation.

In other words, a Chinese laborer who was in the United States at the time of the ratification of the treaty of 1880 has the right to come and go at his own good pleasure with as absolute protection, if the guaranty of the treaty is carried out, as is accorded to an Englishman, an Irishman, a German, or a Russian. Let it be borne in mind that this treaty is of force to-day, that it is the abiding solemn compact and pledge of the two governments each to the other. The treaty gave to the United States the power not absolutely to exclude Chinese laborers who never had been here, but the power to regulate, limit, or suspend their right to come, but such suspension must be reasonable and must apply only to laborers.

In 1882 the Congress of the United States strained this treaty to the utmost, when the act was passed absolutely forbidding the coming of Chinese laborers who had never been here, for the period of ten years. Here was an absolute prohibition which could scarcely be said to be a reasonable limitation or suspension of the right to come. But the act of 1882 does not pretend to take from Chinese laborers who were here at the time of the ratification of the treaty the right to remain or the right to go abroad and return. It is true the act contains provisions which trammel the Chinaman who desires to go abroad no little, by requiring of him to obtain a certificate of identity which must be filed in the custom-house, which must go through a considerable routine of red tape, but which when put in the shape required by the law is his passport and guaranty that on his return home he may land on our shores. While embarrassment may have been thrown in the way of the execution of this law, the Government has not pretended to repudiate it, but it is the law of the land to-day, and the treaty of 1880 from which I have quoted is the treaty of full force between China and the United States.

It is true another treaty was negotiated by the present Administration a few months since with the Chinese Government through its minister in Washington, who was authorized by his Government to negotiate the same. In that treaty, if it were ratified, provision is made for the exclusion of Chinese laborers for twenty years with the consent of China. The Senate, however, amended the treaty, which made it necessary for it to go back to China for ratification of the amendment. If the Chinese Government agrees to the amendments, then the treaty becomes the supreme law of the land, and there is no question about the right of Congress to pass an act excluding Chinese laborers, with a few excepted classes, for the period of twenty years.

I have not been able to learn that the Government of the United States has any official intelligence that the Government of China has rejected the amendments which this Senate proposed to the treaty. If the Chinese Government has not rejected them, and it should within the next few days agree to the amendments and ratify the treaty, then the pending bill would be a slap by this Government in the face of the Chinese Government that would seem to me to be unwise and unwarrantable.

But it is said there is a rumor or somebody has seen a statement in a newspaper that the Government of China has refused to concur in the amendments.

As the present indications are that Congress will remain in session for a very considerable period of time, why this hot haste in the enactment of legislation that disregards and violates our solemn compact with China? Why do the great injustice to the Chinaman who is now on the broad ocean on his return to his home in California to deny him the right to land when he reaches there, though he holds in his hand the certificate prescribed by the act of Congress, which by clear implication guarantied his right to return?

Why not act with a little more caution and circumspection? Why not get rid of Chinese labor in the legal and constitutional way without the violation of our faith, which is pledged to the Chinese Government? Not only is the bill now under consideration a violation of the existing treaty, but it is a violation of the provisions and principles of the new treaty, to which I have referred, that is now pending, which is supposed to express in substance the will of the two governments, with the exception of the amendments, which seem to some of us t obe immaterial.

The first section of the pending treaty provides that—

The high contracting parties agree that for a period of twenty years, beginning with the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, the coming, except under the conditions hereinafter specified, of Chinese laborers to the United States shall be absolutely prohibited [and this prohibition shall extend to the return of Chinese laborers who are not now in the United States, whether holding return certificates under existing laws or not].

The part in brackets is one of the proposed amendments. In the second article of the treaty it is provided that—

The preceding article shall not apply to the return to the United States of any Chinese laborer who has a lawful wife, child, or parent in the United States, or property therein of the value of $1,000, or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement. Nevertheless, every such Chinese laborer shall, before leaving the United States, deposit, as a condition of his return, with the collector of customs of the district from which he departs, a full description in writing of his family, or property, or debts, as aforesaid, and shall be furnished by said collector with such certificate of his right to return under this treaty as the laws of the United States may now or hereafter prescribe, and not inconsistent with the provisions of this treaty; and should the written description aforesaid be proved to be false, the right of return thereunder, or of continued residence after return, shall in each case be forfeited.

Then it provides that the return shall be within one year from the date of leaving the United States, but the time may be extended for an additional period not to exceed one year, in cases where, by reason of sickness or other cause of disability beyond his control, such Chinese laborer may be rendered unable to return. And the other amendment proposed by the Senate is in these words:

And no such Chinese laborer shall be permitted to enter the United States by land or sea without producing to the proper officer of the customs the return certificate herein required.

This is in substance the treaty agreed upon by the President of the United States and the Emperor of China. The amendments have not been agreed upon, but it shows that they were in accord on the question as to the right of a certain class of Chinese residents of this country to depart from it and return to it. The class of cases is such that great hardship will be wrought if the right to return is denied, as in case of the Chinaman having a wife, child, parent, property, etc., in this country.

Now, Mr. President, I am opposed to the admission of Chinese laborers into this country, and I am willing to do any act or vote for any law that is necessary to exclude them from our shores whenever it can be done without violating our solemn pledge to the Chinese Government contained in our treaty stipulations, without violating the provisions of our own statutes, and without violating the common principles of humanity; but I do not think the exigencies of the case are so great as to make it necessary to violate faith with the Chinese Government, or to be unreasonable and inhuman, or to do acts that are ungenerous, unjustifiable, and oppressive.

This great Government, with its 60,000,000 of free citizens, can not afford to exercise cruelty or do acts of flagrant injustice to the humblest subject of the most arbitrary government in Asia. What are the provisions of the pending bill? It is entitled "A supplement to an act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to the Chinese,' approved the 6th day of May, 1882."

It provides as follows:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any Chinese laborer who shall at any time heretofore have been, or who may now or hereafter be, a resident within the United States, and who shall have departed or shall depart therefrom, and shall not have returned before the passage of this act, to return to or remain in the United States.

SEC. 2. That no certificates of identity provided for in the fourth and fifth sections of the act to which this is a supplement shall hereafter be issued; and every certificate heretofore issued in pursuance thereof is hereby declared void and of no effect, and the Chinese laborer claiming admission by virtue thereof shall not be permitted to enter the United States.

SEC. 3. That all the duties prescribed, liabilities, penalties, and forfeitures imposed, and the powers conferred by the second, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth sections of the act to which this is a supplement, are hereby extended and made applicable to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. That all such part or parts of the act to which this is a supplement as are inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. President, the treaty of 1880 which now exists between the two governments provides distinctly and emphatically that the Chinese laborer who was a resident of the United States at the time of the ratification of the treaty shall have the right to go and come from time to time at his own free will and accord, with all the rights of citizens and subjects of the most favored nation. The act of Congress provides the certificates that shall be obtained when they desire to travel abroad, to enable them to return, which implies an obligation and a solemn pledge by the United States that on compliance with the terms they shall have the right to return.

This proposed act is in the very teeth of the treaty, and is in the very teeth of the implied pledge made by this Government to each Chinaman who was a resident of this country at the time the treaty was ratified, and who has complied with the statute on that subject, that he shall have the right to return to his home in this country. It is therefore such an act as neither this Government nor any other great government professing to be guided by the principles of right and justice should feel itself at liberty to perform. But we are told that the Congress of the United States has the power to repeal a treaty or abrogate it, or to set it aside absolutely. This is true. The Congress, with the assent of the President, has this power. It may repudiate its solemn compact and refuse longer to be bound by it; but can the Congress of the United States afford to do it in a manner that is hasty, unjust, and at variance with the common principles of humanity? Can a great government like ours afford to repeal a treaty where the interests of individuals are seriously affected, and where the repeal may work the absolute ruin of many persons, without even giving such person notice in advance or allowing such person or persons any time to put their affairs in a shape to conform to the provisions of the repealing act?

My amendment does not go far enough. It ought to provide that this act shall not go into effect until notice has been given by the Government of the United States to the Chinese Government, and until ample time has been given for Chinamen residing in this country who are abroad and who have obtained certificates in accordance with the act of Congress to return, say six months', or three months', or even thirty days' notice. But the bill proposes no such act of justice, but it shuts down upon the helpless Chinaman who left here with the plighted faith of this Government that he should have the right to return upon the certificate, by the passage of an act while he is crossing the ocean that meets him as a barrier when he reaches our shores. He is no way at fault. He has done no act in violation of any treaty or statutory provision. The pledge of the Government—for it was a virtual pledge when it was provided that the Chinaman going abroad should conform to certain regulations which should entitle him to return—the pledge of the Government, I say, is violated in such case, and it is guilty of palpable bad faith. I repeat, therefore, that my amendment is not as broad as it ought to be, but knowing the temper of the Senate, and knowing the motives that prompt both great political parties to hasty action in this matter, I have so framed the amendment as to provide relief only in the most aggravated cases of outrage and wrong which the act, if it becomes a law, will perpetrate.

Mr. President, I believe Senators are making a mistake in this matter. An outcry has been raised against Chinese laborers and there is a popular sentiment in favor of excluding them from our shores. In that I cordially concur; but the American people on sober second thought are a just people. They are a great, magnanimous people, and on cool reflection they will not be satisfied that an act containing the gross hardships and injustice of the present act was necessary even as a matter of party tactics in a great political campaign. I do not believe either party will make any votes by rushing through a measure of this sort with indecent haste on the heel of the session and in the midst of a great political campaign, and we certainly will not add anything to the reputation of the Government for justice, humanity, and fair dealing.

Mr. President, suppose in place of the subjects of China this legislation were directed against the subjects of the British Government, or the German Government, or any other one of the most favored nations, how different the matter would be. While the power to repeal the treaty would exist in that case as well as in the present, great caution and circumspection would be used in case of the repeal to do no injustice either to the Government or to its citizens or subjects.

It may be said that the Chinese Government is more forbearing and cares less about the protection of its subjects. Yet we may try the patience of that Government until it will resent wrong. The trade with a great country like China is worth a vast amount to a friendly government like the United States. That trade is only in its infancy, and if the two governments cultivate proper relations towards each other it will grow to immense proportions. We already have merchants and other persons following different pursuits residents of China.

Nearly all the Christian churches have missionaries in China. It is regarded as an inviting field for the spread of the gospel. Now, if we have the right to abrogate or repeal the treaty between us and the Chinese Government, and we do it in what some may term the indecent haste which is being exhibited on this occasion, who would deny the right of the Chinese Government to expel from China every merchant, every missionary, and every other citizen of the United States within the limits of that vast empire? Suppose the Emperor of China should exhibit the resentment that any one of the great European powers would do in a like case, and should issue his decree commanding Americans, merchants, missionaries, etc., to depart immediately from China, and that those who had been to America on a visit and were now on the high seas returning to China should not land when they reached there, what right would we have to complain?

But, Mr. President, if the Chinese Government should act promptly and maintain its dignity on this occasion, and should drive our merchants and our missionaries from the empire, you would hear a muttering of discontent from a vast number of good citizens interested in mercantile and commercial affairs, and you would hear the indignant rebuke of all the Christian denominations of the United States. It that should come, instead of political capital being made by this action, it would result in the political downfall of the party regarded most at fault.

Mr. President, I know very well that this bill will be passed with great unanimity. Those who vie with each other as its advocates on both sides of this Chamber are even impatient at the delay that permits reasonable debate; but I do not think this Senate can afford to pass the bill in its present shape without at least providing for the very gross hardship intended to be mitigated by my amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to raise a point of order on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. It seems to me that it is not in order now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has not yet been offered.

Mr. BROWN. I offer the amendment now.

Mr. TELLER. I raise the point of order that the amendment is not in order; that it is too late.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add the following proviso to section 1:

Provided, That this act shall not apply to any Chinese laborer resident of the United States who has departed therefrom with the certificate of identity provided for under the treaty by the laws of the United States, and who is now absent, and who shall have sailed from China or other foreign country for the United States, and who shall be upon the ocean on his return at the date of the passage of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A point of order having been raised, the Chair decides that——

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Colorado has not stated his point of order. I should be glad to know the reason why he thinks the amendment is not in order.

Mr. TELLER. I stated that it is too late, the yeas and nays having been ordered on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BROWN. Debate has been allowed since.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is an obvious one. The Chair will state that the bill having been ordered to a third reading, it has passed the stage at which amendments can be proposed except by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the proposal of the amendment?

Mr. BROWN. I hope no one is afraid to vote on the amendment. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be received.

Mr. TELLER. I object to the reception of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposal of the amendment by the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. TELLER and Mr. MITCHELL. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. REAGAN and Mr. BLAIR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to inquire whether the debate is proceeding by unanimous consent or as a right and privilege under the rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that debate is in order.

Mr. HARRIS. The question being, Shall the bill pass?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question being, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. REAGAN. While I shall vote to sustain the motion made by the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire, in order to avoid a misconception of the reasons for my vote, to make a statement to the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Texas allow me a moment? I desire to inquire whether any motion of that kind is pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no such motion pending. Unanimous consent was asked, but objection was made.

Mr. REAGAN. I understood that the Senator from Ohio had moved to postpone the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Unanimous consent was asked and denied.

Mr. SHERMAN. I asked unanimous consent that the bill might be postponed, but objection was made. A motion to postpone is in order, although a motion to amend is not in order.

Mr. REAGAN. I understood the Senator to make a motion to postpone.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to have the bill laid over for a day or two until we can get a reply from the President. That is all I desire.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator does not make the motion, then?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care to move to postpone the matter indefinitely.

Mr. REAGAN. I understood that the Senator made a motion to temporarily postpone the matter until we could get further information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion would not be in order. The Senator from Ohio asked unanimous consent that the consideration of the bill might be informally postponed for a short time, which could only be done by agreement. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] objected to that, and the question therefore recurs, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HARRIS. Still, if the Senator from Texas will allow me, it is perfectly in order for the Senator from Ohio to move to postpone the bill until to-morrow or any other named day. He can take as many days or as few as he chooses, if he desires to move to postpone at all.

Mr. TELLER. I presume he knows that.

Mr. HARRIS. I suppose he does, and I am willing for the whole Senate to know it also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. I thought there was a pending motion, and it was my purpose to direct some remarks to that, because I intended to vote for the motion to postpone, because it seems to me that this matter comes before the Senate in a very unfortunate way. From all sides it is agreed that we have no information that the treaty approved by the Senate in May last has not been ratified by the Chinese Government.

One Senator has assumed that we must presume that the bill came from the Administration or was inspired by it. Another assumes from a newspaper report that it is an Administration measure. The Administration certainly would know how, if it desired to secure the passage of a measure, to communicate information to that effect either to the Committee on Foreign Relations or to some member on one or tho other side of the Chamber. It is assumed on all hands that there is ne information from the State Department or from the President that our treaty with China has been acted on.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator just one question?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator from Texas understand that the Administration is opposed to this measure?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not. I have no understanding about the position of the Administration any more than the Senator from Oregon has. In what I have to say about this measure I do not choose to lower the dignity of this body by discussing as a matter of petty partisanship a question which affects the national honor and the character of the Senate of the United States before the world. I shall not get down to that, young Senator as I am.

We have no information coming from the proper Department that China has refused to ratify the treaty which has been approved by the Senate. That treaty contains stipulations, amended as the Senate desired to amend it, so as to cover the wishes of this country and the American people on the subject of the restriction of Chinese immigration. To carry out that treaty we passed an act of Congress which has been for a few days before the President of the United States.

Shall we now pass another act assuming that the Government of China has refused to ratify this treaty when we do not know it, and put two acts on this subject, started from different points of view, before the President at the same time? I take it that the President does no want to be put in that sort of a fix. At least, if I were President I would not want it done.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I observe that the RECORD discloses that on yesterday he voted in the affirmative on the passage of this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I will enlighten the Senator from Kansas further on that subject in a few minutes, if he will just bear with patience. What I am now saying is that we have made a treaty which as far as we know stands binding against the Senate and the United States today. We know that we have passed an act to carry out that treaty, and it is in the hands of the President. Now, without knowing that that treaty is rejected, and without waiting a reasonable time to obtain information, we propose to pass a law utterly disregarding a solemn treaty and an act of the Congress of the United States, and we propose to do that in the face not only of the American people but of the civilized world. We propose thus to deal with a nation the most populous on the face of the earth, with which though our commerce is not very great yet when the population and commerce on our Pacific coast become greater and when the means of transportation on the Pacific Ocean shall be increased, it will then be a very considerable commerce if we maintain proper friendly relations with that great and populous Empire.

I have said this much simply because I am not willing, without a protest, to see the Senate go forward in this sort of way to compromise its dignity and its honor and the dignity and honor of this Government before the world.

Leaving that subject, I will say, upon the policy of Chinese restriction, that I have always favored, since I have been in Congress for the last fifteen years, I believe, the strongest measure for the restriction of Chinese immigration to this country, and I am prepared now to sustain the strongest measures for the restriction of Chinese labor that are consistent with law and with reason. I was so inclined, not from any mere matter of prejudice, but from a feeling that the restriction of Chinese labor is necessary to preserve the rights, the prosperity, and the dignity of American labor. That is one of the reasons.

Another reason which I had covers a broader and a more important field, if possible. By the strain which, as almost an inevitable necessity, fell upon the Constitution during the exigencies of war by the enfranchisement of some eight millions of people not heretofore enjoying the full rights of citizenship, and illy prepared to discharge the duties of citizenship, needing education and instruction to bring them up to a realization of what the rights and duties of citizens are, by the introduction into the country from Western Europe, from the Christian nations of Europe, perhaps three hundred thousand or four hundred thousand emigrants a year, which it has been the policy of this country to invite, so far as they are proper persons to be received, who, like our native element, were not informed as to the theory, the character, and genius of our Government, have to be educated into a knowledge of our republican system of dual governments, we have a strain placed upon the Constitution and character of our Government which, to say the least of it, puts in some measure of peril the preservation and the perpetuation of our constitutional form of government in the spirit in which it was made. It is a government intended for people capable of self-government, intended for people whose intelligence enables them to understand the functions of government, and the duties of the officers necessary to administer that government.

With our 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 blacks, or more perhaps, with the vast influx of foreign emigration, uninformed as to the nature, the genius, and the character of our Government, I was unwilling to see additional elements brought into this country, especially a race which does not assimilate with ours in color, in character, in habits of thought, in religion, in their ideas of government, in everything that makes up a people. I mean those of them who come here, unless they shall remain hereafter for generations to be educated into a knowledge of our institutions, who are utterly disqualified to understand the nature and character of our Government and to become citizens whose authority is to aid in the making of laws and in the administration of laws.

It is reasons like these, briefly expressed, which have made me at all times in favor of the restriction of Chinese labor, and I am as much so now as I ever was. I hope the statement which I have made will satisfy my friend from Kansas.

I am not only opposed now to the introduction of Chinese labor, but I have been at all times. I have been in Congress ready to act upon the question. I remain so to-day for the reason, first, that it would degrade and impoverish American labor; second, because we do not want an alien race that does not assimilate with our people and unfitted to carry on our great system of self-government brought in to put further strain on the Constitution and form of our Government.

I wish it had been the consent of the Senate to allow the request made by the Senator from Ohio to prevail, so as to give us a few days at least for further information as to whether the Chinese Government has ratified or rejected the treaty so lately approved by the Senate of the United States, that we might know we were not doing an awkward, foolish, undignified thing, unworthy the American Senate.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I have voted, I believe, for every bill for the restriction of Chinese immigration that has been passed during the ten years I have been in Congress, but I do not wish to disguise to the country nor pretend to disguise to myself the belief that the considerations upon which this public policy has been urged are without any foundation whatever. I have not deceived myself with the allegation that these people should be excluded because they do not assimilate with the people of the United States, that they do not intermix or intermarry with them, when there are twelve millions of people in this country as diverse from the white American people as any two races within the whole range of creation.

Why, then, should this great deliberative body put its support of a measure of this character upon such a baseless and manifestly untrue foundation? Is there not as great diversity between the colored man, the African, and the white man, as there is between the Mongolian, the yellow man, and the white man? Yet, the African makes a reasonably good citizen, and performs a useful part in the public economy of the country. Why, then, shall you seek to justify this legislation with reasons which are in defiance of your own constitutional amendment that every person born in the United States and subject to its jurisdiction shall be a citizen? If you quibble upon the words "subject to its jurisdiction," it can have no just foundation. You can not make that point against the philosophy, the spirit, the purpose upon which that enactment was made a fundamental provision of your Constitution.

Neither do I deceive myself, nor am I willing to be committed to the country and to the future of this country upon the proposition that the contact of our Christian civilization and our superior race with an inferior one will degrade us. I shall not insult the Christian religion, nor the teachings of Christ, nor the great commission to go and preach the gospel to all the world, with the assertion that it will degrade the superior Christianity, the superior religion, and the superior race for it to come in contact with all the world.

Mr. President, there is nothing in this proposition. Neither is there anything in the proposition that American labor is to be degraded, or that it is to be substituted by and with an inferior race and a different civilization. These are not the economies which are to prevail in this country or in the world's future. I do not care to enter into the discussion of the great economic questions related to this subject, but I wish for myself to repudiate any belief or any public action based upon such considerations. They have no part in a true system of economy.

My support of these measures, which I have endeavored to modify so far as they were unreasonable and harsh and severely punitive, has been based upon the proposition that the people of California and Oregon, with great unanimity, were opposed to the admission and the permanent residence among them, and even to the temporary residence of the laborers of this race of people. I recognize the right of every State or community of people to say who in large numbers shall be component parts of their civilization, and be their opinions good or bad I should accord to them the right to keep them out, although it be true that these foreigners, these Mongolians, may be made useful citizens; although it is true that they are embraced within the circle of civilizing and religious influences, and that it is a part of every wise public policy on the part of a Christian civilized nation to do the greatest good to individuals as well as to peoples.

Although that is true, I am not willing that the locality, the community, the State where they may go, shall bear the burden of the upward civilization and training of this race—of the long time which it may require to make them sympathetic in feeling and homogeneous with them, and this latter quality, however unnecessary for the economic and industrial development of a State or people, is a most important consideration in its social interests and in its race development. Neither am I willing rudely to disturb, even though future benefit should accrue to the great majority of the people of a community or State, its relations of labor and industrial employment.

Therefore I have thought it wise, and I now think it wise, for that community and that State which wishes to proscribe Chinese among them to forbid their entrance in any shape or form; to exercise with the power of a State government, with the consent of the General Government and its legislation, the power of the State, the local government, to forbid their entrance among their people, and, if they choose, their pursuit of any occupation rather than to commit this country to a policy of non-intercourse with so large a portion of the globe.

If I could have dictated the policy I should have cultivated commercial intercourse, I should have invited not the laboring classes, but those who dealt in trade and commerce to a participation of our privileges with those of other people, excluding them from all political privileges, but giving them the advantages of commercial intercourse and allowing in moderate numbers the admission of laborers in such States as desired them, and under such conditions and limitations as might be necessary to prevent a permanent residence of any great number of them.

Mr. President, the exclusion by treaty of the laboring classes of the Chinese was the wise policy of this Administration, and it can not be ridiculed by quotations and citations from newspapers as to kitchen cabinets. That was the treaty which the present distinguished Secretary of State negotiated, carefully excluding from admission into this country all Chinese except such as come here for other purposes than labor, excluding this dreaded competition with American labor, which seems to be with some persons the greatest possible calamity which could come to the American people—this idea that the greatest possible good that can come to a people is a monopoly of labor by a class.

What have we here? The Senate, a distinct body, with a high function to perform in regard to the foreign relations of sixty million of people with every other people, the Senate, a separate constitutional body, has pledged the public faith of this country to certain propositions of agreement, a treaty, to the sovereignty of China; and having done that in the orderly course of negotiation and pledge of the national faith, the Senate comes forward to violate the public obligations which it has made and declared, and consents as one of the legislative bodies of the country to an enactment positively violating and defeating the covenanted faith and proposition which they have made to the Government of China.

Therefore the proposition of the Senator from Ohio was a wise one. However extreme Senators may be in reference to the admission of the Chinese, however willing to vote for the most severely punitive enactments, it would have been wise to have waited and considered whether the dignity of this body, whether the public faith of this Government, whether the ordinary good faith that exists between nations, should be observed, and the treaty, if it comes back ratified, accepted, instead of being denied and set aside by the action of this body immediately subsequent to its treaty pledges to the Chinese Government. It is idle to talk about information being received in "one way or another" that the Government of the United States is advised that China has rejected the treaty.

This body has its constitutional methods for obtaining information. It has its constitutional duties. It has no right to consider anything in regard to matters of the executive department but that which comes in the mode provided by the Constitution; and Senators can not shield themselves by saying that they assume certain things to be true. What right has any reasonble man to assume a matter of constitutional duty when it is to come to him in a prescribed constitutional form and method? We are sworn not to assume, not to suppose, but to act on information communicated in a constitutional method by the President to the two Houses of Congress. Not only are such assumptions and such suppositions forbidden to us, but apart from this they are unreasonable and untrue.

This proposed action has nothing to justify it. Should the Senate and the House desire to pass the most severely punitive bill to assert, as they do practically assert, that there shall be no intercourse hereafter with the 350,000,000 of people in China? Should they assert this policy of non-intercourse and stand upon the exclusive policy of China, which we with others forced her to abandon, of complete isolation, you can not draw the line. You can find no arguments to justify drawing a line of non-intercourse with one and allowing intercourse with other peoples. The reason, the public policy which requires intercourse with one people requires it with all peoples. Different terms and conditions of intercourse with different peoples may be required, but the public policy which demands it with one requires it with all.

If you justify yourselves, which you can do by the assertion that we do not desire in the midst of our people another people of different economies, of different habits, that we have enough people to occupy this country, that is one thing; and that is the only proposition upon which this policy of exclusion can be justified. You can not do it upon the principle of non-intercourse. You can not do it upon the idea that you will benefit your people by cutting them off from whatever is better, whatever is wiser, whether it be in the humblest or in the more advanced peoples of the earth.

Something is to be learned from all people. Profit is to be derived from all commercial intercourse. The world was made with its oceans, with its rivers, with its communication of thought, and when you establish a policy of restricted intercourse you should do it wisely and not upon the basis of popular prejudice, not upon the proposition that these people are incapable of civilization or incapable of performing any part in the public economy of the world.

Mr. President, I am willing to vote, as I have voted time and again here, for restricting this immigration, for excluding it entirely from the people of the Pacific States. I have voted for their exclusion from all parts of the United States, although the 150,000 or 200,000 or 300,000 Chinamen here are not felt as an evil in the Southern States and are not known as an evil in the East. They make no impression upon the great body of pursuits or upon the industries of the people. They are not competitors to any great extent in three-fourths of the Union with the people of the United States.

But I have, in deference to the united and universal public opinion of the Pacific coast, voted for their exclusion from all parts of the country and for the restriction of their immigration; but I recognize the fact that they have an ancient civilization from which something is to be learned; that they have eminent examples of virtue and character in their history; that for thousands of years they have maintained government and unity of race and civilization, and that their history for the most part is unstained with the blood and human suffering which have characterized other peoples.

I shall make no opposition to this proposed action, but I desire to express my opinion that there is no foundation for it; that this unseemly haste, this violation of the public faith of the country as now exhibited in the action of the Senate, has no justification in the necessities of the occasion.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the attitude of this question before the Senate at this moment presents a very interesting and a very important inquiry, in which there is involved a necessary comparison of the constitutional duties of the House of Representatives and of the Senate.

The Senate, as a part of the treaty-making power of the United States, in conjunction with the President, by a vote of two-thirds, has a right to put upon the statute-book that which the Constitution terms a supreme law of the land in the form of a treaty. It is conceded, however, that the Congress of the United States, of which the House of Representatives is a member, and in which the President has a voice, has the right to repeal or abrogate any treaty that the Senate and the President may enter into.

The Congress of the United States, therefore, occupies the position of supreme power under the Constitution over questions like this. It is through the Congress of the United States that the people of the United States in their sovereign capacity also express their voice, and that within the limitations of the Constitution is considered in this country as being omnipotent, or at least beyond control.

The Senate of the United States has made two treaties with China, one called the Burlingame treaty, in 1868, and a subsequent treaty, which was negotiated in 1880. The public mind in the United States has been growing gradually more and more dissatisfied with the principles of the Burlingame treaty, which were modified by the treaty of 1880 in respect of the right of Chinese to migrate to this country. Indeed, the question has risen to that degree of importance and of stress that it seems now to be impossible to check the opinion of the people of the United States and hold it in restraint any longer. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] the other day uttered the solemn fact when he said that the exclusion of the Chinese from the United States had become an American decree; that Congress had nothing else to do from this time forward than to register and record that decree; and that they would find agents here to accomplish that result, whether we chose to do it or not. That is an actual situation which, I think, both of these Houses could not in the slightest degree affect; certainly they could not reverse it.

The House of Representatives, having its co-ordinate legislative power with us, has looked over this subject and has become informed of the public sentiment of the United States just as we are, and it has come to its resolution that Chinese immigration to this country, of the laboring classes at least, must be absolutely and peremptorily prohibited. It therefore originated a bill and passed it, seemingly in very great haste, and almost with entire unanimity, which goes to the very root of the subject. It is a bill which cuts up root and branch all of the doctrine that is in the Burlingame treaty and all that is in the treaty of 1880, and puts a positive, unequivocal prohibition upon the immigration of Chinese laborers to this country. That is the action of the House of Representatives.

The House of Representatives finds itself, however, confronted by this situation, that the Senate, within a recent period of four months, I believe, on its part proposed a treaty to China. When the Chinese treaty came to the Senate, as I am informed, and I think I am correctly informed, it was negotiated and concluded by a minister who had what are called plenary or full powers, so that the negotiation in the form in which it reached us, if it had been ratified by the Senate of the United States, would have been a treaty in all of its essential parts, and would have required no additional act on the part of the Chinese Government to have made it an absolutely obligatory treaty.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator yield for an interruption?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. DOLPH. I have good authority for saying that the Senator is entirely mistaken about that; that the Chinese minister had no fuller power on such a question than our minister in China; and that the treaty had to be transmitted, and was immediately transmitted to the Chinese Government.

Mr. MORGAN. I adhere to my opinion on the subject and to the information that I have, which I think is quite as good as that of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. DOLPH. I get mine directly from the Chinese legation here.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not go to the Chinese legation for mine.

Mr. DOLPH. Nor do I.

Mr. MORGAN. But I go to sources quite as high.

Mr. DOLPH. I got my information from the gentleman referred to this morning by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MORGAN. I am informed that the minister came here with a treaty already prepared, which had been submitted to the Emperor of China before he came, if not in the very words in which the treaty was negotiated at least upon all the principles involved in it, and it contained an expression that a Chinese minister would have lost his head for making if it had not been true. I will read that:

> And whereas the Government of China, in view of the antagonism and much deprecated and serious disorders to which the presence of Chinese laborers has given rise in certain parts of the United States, desires to prohibit the emigration of such laborers from China to the United States.

No Chinese minister ever made such a declaration as that on the part of his Government without previous exact authority for making it.

Mr. BLAIR. Do I understand the Senator, then, that the only modifications made in this treaty coming directly from China, just as China wanted it, are the amendments suggested by the Senate?

Mr. MORGAN. I say that the treaty was negotiated by a minister who had full power, and if the treaty had been assented to by the Senate of the United States as negotiated it would have been to-day a treaty between China and the United States without any necessity for the formal ratification in Peking.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado appeals to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator stated that the clause which he read would cost a Chinese minister his head if he had put it in without the permission of the Emperor, or words to that effect. I wish to know why the Senator makes that statement. What is there in Chinese law or Chinese polity to justify a statement of that kind?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not propose to go into a history of Chinese law or Chinese polity in this brief debate that I have here this day, and in which I shall participate for a very short time. I speak of my information. Of course I do not suppose that the bosom of China is very widely opened or unlocked to anybody; but I know enough of that despotic government to understand perfectly well that if a minister should come here and make a representation that the Emperor of China desired to prohibit the immigration of laborers from China to the United States when that was not true, and he had no authority for saying so, he would lose his head.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to suggest that ever since we have had any knowledge of the Chinese it has been their policy to prohibit their people from going abroad?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not so read the Burlingame treaty. I read a joint announcement in the Burlingame treaty of both parties that the doctrine of expatriation is allowed, and not only allowed but encouraged. Immigration back and forth from China and other countries is provided for and put upon a very high basis of morality and public policy both.

Mr. BROWN. With a right to change allegiance.

Mr. MORGAN. The right to change allegiance is expressly announced in the Burlingame treaty, and we considered that a great revolution in Chinese ideas. There is no treaty that was ever penned by the hand of man which contains a stronger expression on this subject than the Burlingame treaty. So I think a little careful reading will correct some of our wild views and vagaries about matters of this sort.

This is the situation: The House of Representatives, impressed as the Senate is impressed with this great American decree for the absolute exclusion of Chinese laborers from this country by any means which are available, finds that we have negotiated this treaty and that the Senate had amended it in certain particulars, so as to make it, as was supposed, more stringent. I never concurred in the view that the amendments added anything to the significance of the treaty, but the supposition was that it was necessary that we should propose it again to China as an unconcluded negotiation in order that the Chinese Government might accede to the amendments which we submitted. It has been four months since that was done. In the mean time the two great political parties of the United States have nominated their candidates for the Presidency. When the candidate of the Republican party for the Presidency was nominated, by some sudden outburst of patriotism on the part of Chinese—I do not know how it happened—they expressed the greatest gratification at the nomination of Mr. Harrison because he had voted for the Chinese side of these questions.

Mr. SPOONER. What evidence of that is there?

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose I have a right in this body now, after four or five weeks of the most extraordinary experience that I have ever observed, to make some reference to a newspaper account. I am very sorry, Mr. President, that I have it to do, and I am exceedingly sorry that we do not organize a committee of the correspondents of the various newspapers in this country for the purpose of giving Senators information on various public topics. It would be a very considerable addition to the intelligence of this body, to the information we receive from day to day, and to the fortifying of our moral convictions in regard to great public questions. It would be a great thing if we could have the galleries to come down on this floor and give us private information as to what we ought to do, the facts we ought to have, which are so assiduously gleaned every day and laid before the world. Our RECORD has got to be a mere supplement to the New York World, the Chicago Times, the Cincinnati Enquirer, and a few others of the leading papers of the United States, a mere supplement, a mere editing of scraps gathered by editorial ingenuity and industry out of the leading daily newspapers in the United States. What a blessing it is, Mr. President, to live in a country where we have the privilege of free speech, so that the Senate can be informed from time to time by these gentlemen who have means of ascertaining things that no Senator here would dare to presume that he had, things that come from the "kitchen cabinet," even the odors that ascend the stairway to gratify the nostrils!

It is like the case of the little boy described by Dickens, who having nothing to eat at home, nothing to subsist upon at home, took up a position about the stairway of the kitchen of some of the lords in London and feasted upon what he could smell through his nose.

That seems to be the business of the Senate of the United States of late days—fishing up from the correspondence of the newspapers the odors we can gather and distribute about in this way from the places that we are not permitted to enter.

So I can refer now, I suppose, Mr. President, to the newspapers for the statement that the Chinese were very enthusiastic over the nomination of Mr. Harrison, and perhaps the Chinese Government, taking the cue from the Six Companies or from Chinese of distinction in the United States, have thought it would be better not to ratify this treaty as amended by the Senate of the United States, but to delay until November and take the chances of his election. Then they would get a better treaty and be on more favorable ground.

The House of Representatives, snuffing the tainted air doubtless, have discerned the fact that there was danger in front; and they concluded that it was a good time to strike, a very good time, and that they had better pass a law which would emanate entirely from the constitutional power of the Government of the United States as represented in Congress and in the Presidency, which should prohibit absolutely the coming of the Chinese here, rather than take the chances of some misunderstanding between us and China in respect to our treaty rights and relations, and take the chances also of this American sentiment and decree being reversed between now and November. So they moved to the front, they put their knife to the root of the tree, and, if this bill passes, Chinese immigration is dead.

That is not all that is dead, I grant you. The treaty itself, of course, and the Burlingame treaty, in respect of the features authorizing Chinese immigration to this country, are dead, and the treaty of 1880 is dead. They all die together, and they die the death—a death from which, as I understand it, there is to be no resurrection in the United States. This treaty itself, and the Burlingame treaty, and the treaty of 1880, all go together; and the House of Representatives, exercising its constitutional powers and functions, has declared in harmony with the declaration of the Emperor of China that it is our will in the United States, as it is also the will of the Emperor of China, that no more Chinese laborers shall be admitted into this country. The two countries, therefore, concur in the restatement of their views, entirely reversing the doctrines and all the statements in the Burlingame treaty. The House of Representatives concludes that it has a right to present a bill to the Senate in which it shall express this American decree and by which it shall exclude Chinese absolutely from this country and take no risks of the November election about it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for a short question?

Mr. MORGAN. For a short one, yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator from Alabama understand that the pending bill has any relation at all to any Chinese laborer who never was in this country? In other words, if this bill shall become a law will it operate to keep out a single Chinaman who never has been in this country?

Mr. MORGAN. With the act to which it is supplemental, it will.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am speaking of this bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I am speaking about the whole farrago; I am not talking about one piece of legislation alone.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it not a fact that this bill simply relates to those Chinese persons who are now here and may hereafter go away, or those who have been here and have gone away?

Mr. MORGAN. I am talking about the condition in which the law will be when we pass this bill. No Chinaman can then get here.

Mr. MITCHELL. But the Senator from Alabama does not understand that this bill, after it shall become a law (as I hope it will), in connection with existing legislation will be an absolute exclusion bill for all time against Chinese laborers?

Mr. MORGAN. I think it will.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it will not.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I hope it will, at any rate; and if it is not such that it will, I shall be glad to assist the Senator to make it so.

Mr. MITCHELL. It will operate until the expiration of the treaty, four years hence.

Mr. MORGAN. I want to see whether the gentlemen from the coast, particularly the Senator from Oregon, are in earnest on this subject.

Mr. MITCHELL. So far as that is concerned, I will say to the Senator from Alabama that the records of the Senate will testify for me upon that subject, and I am willing to abide by my record in the Senate as to whether I have been in earnest or not in reference to Chinese exclusion; but I am glad that the Senator from Alabama, if he is willing to vote for this bill (and I do not yet know whether he is or not from any remarks that he has made), has come up to my view so far as this bill goes, and is willing to vote to abrogate the provisions of the existing treaty in order to exclude the coming of Chinese to this country, even those who have been here and have departed.

Mr. MORGAN. I have had very little faith in the sincerity of a great many gentlemen from the Pacific coast about the exclusion of the Chinese, and I have expressed it on this floor oftentimes. They want to hold their Chinese laborers; they do not want to give them up.

Mr. MITCHELL. In answer to that, I say that the statement is made without any authority, without any basis whatever upon which to predicate it, and there is not one word of truth in it from beginning to end.

Mr. MORGAN. My basis, Mr. President, is my personal observation on the coast of the Pacific, with my own eyes and ears. I know that there are numbers of people who desire to hold their Chinese laborers; the plutocracy of that coast want them.

The Committee on Foreign Relations of this body held an investigation of this subject a few years ago, and Senators and Members of the House asserted that it was testified in California that 10 per cent. of the people of that coast desired to retain their Chinese laborers. Who are the 10 per cent.? The men who own $10,000 where an ordinary laboring man owns one. I have got the testimony on the ocular demonstration of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives that a very large, influential, and powerful class of people on the Pacific coast did desire to retain their Chinese laborers.

Mr. MITCHELL. This question, let me say to the Senator from Alabama, was submitted to a vote of the people of California—the voting population—a few years ago. Can the Senator state, and will the Senator have the candor and honesty to state, to the Senate the result of that vote?

Mr. MORGAN. The word "honesty," Mr. President, is one that the Senator from Oregon ought not to use with too much glibness. He ought not to impeach my honesty. I think I have as much honesty as he has.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am speaking of political honesty, and I am speaking of the charge that the Senator has made against the people of the Pacific coast.

Mr. MORGAN. The man that is a politically dishonest man can not be trusted with my pocket-book. I would not trust him with it. I do not take these distinctions, sir; I never have taken them, and I hope that I never shall see the day that I will do so.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator can make his own application.

Mr. MORGAN. I can state from the investigation of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, which is in print, and I can state as matter of ocular demonstration to me, and of careful observation on the Pacific coast, on two occasions, that a fair proportion (I will say 10 per cent.) of the people of that coast desire to retain their Chinese laborers. The class of people I refer to are the owners of large railroad interests, the owners of large cattle ranches, the owners of vast ditches for irrigating purposes in that country—men who want labor that they can control absolutely, or as nearly so as we used to control labor in the South.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. I receive, sir, with a great deal of allowance, this broadcast statement that every man on the Pacific coast desires to get rid of Chinese labor. I have never believed it, and I never will believe it until I lose the verity of my senses.

Mr. STEWART. Can the Senator name a man on the Pacific coast that is in favor of retaining the Chinese?

Mr. MORGAN. If I could do so I would not do so. I would not expose that man to the difficulties of the situation.

Mr. STEWART. I know pretty nearly every man of wealth on the coast, and I do not know one of any party that wants it.

Mr. MORGAN. Then what becomes of the statements made before your committees—the statement made by Mr. Stanford, among others, that 10 per cent. of your people want it?

Mr. STEWART. I do not know one.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator may have his own views. I am going on the evidence submitted to that committee.

I repeat again that I receive with a great deal of allowance these broad, universal statements, these sweeping statements, that the whole people of the Pacific coast want to run the Chinese into the sea and get rid of them. They do not want to do it, Mr. President. If they did, the Chinese would have been gone long ago.

The House of Representatives brought in this bill in a hurry. I am disposed to excuse the hurry, considering the pressure brought to bear upon us here on many questions of a political character, and considering the pressure brought to bear upon us on this question. The House of Representatives, if it meant to take this line of action, as I contend it did, solemnly and deliberately did exactly right in passing the bill before the Chinese Government had signified the ratification of this treaty.

Suppose they had waited until after this treaty had been ratified, and a month or two or six months or one year later had then brought the bill into the House of Representatives and passed it in the very form in which it is now—a supplemental bill—China would have had good reason and right to have said, "Here is a broad, unmitigated breach of faith; not only a breach of faith, but a breach of plighted faith. You proposed to us that if we ratified this treaty it should be the engagement between the United States and China. We did so. You paid us under this treaty $276,000 for the benefit of those persons who had been massacred and plundered on the Pacific coast somewhere. We acceded to it in consideration and in consequence of the statement made in the preamble of this treaty that the Emperor of China desired to prohibit the emigration to this country of laborers. They found it not only very inconvenient but very trying to them, in view of the antagonisms much deprecated, and the serious disorders to which the presence of Chinese laborers had given rise in certain parts of the United States." In view of all that, the Emperor of China said that he was willing and desired to prohibit the emigration of Chinese laborers to this country.

If the House of Representatives desired to take that action, I have no right to impeach their motives, their honor, their integrity, their wisdom, or their deliberations. They struck at the very moment of time when it was right they should strike; for from that moment of time forward that we shall pass this bill, all will understand that the United States Government realizes that for the protection of its communities and the body of its citizenship against contamination and against evil and perverting influences, it relies upon its own legislative power granted by the Constitution, and not upon a treaty with any foreign country. We can not impeach the House of Representatives on that. It will not do for us to undertake it. That House has the right to repeal any treaty we make if we concur with it as a legislative body. It takes two-thirds here to ratify a treaty, but a bare majority may repeal it in concurrence with the House of Representatives and with the approval of the President of the United States. It will not do, sir, for the Senate of the United States to take the ground that while treaties are repealable the House of Representatives can not choose its own time to repeal.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I concur entirely with what the Senator from Alabama has said in the last moment or two of his speech. I desire, however, to ask him whether in his judgment or opinion as a lawyer this pending bill does abrogate and repeal material provisions of our existing treaty with China?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not any more doubt of it than that I have the honor of speaking from this desk.

Mr. MITCHELL. Nor I.

Mr. MORGAN. Nobody that I have ever heard of denies it. It is a repeal by repugnant or oppugnant legislation.

Mr. MITCHELL. No doubt of it.

Mr. MORGAN. I should have been better satisfied if the House had come out and stated "article so and so is hereby repealed." Nevertheless, lawyers will not disagree as to what the effect of this is to be. The power is inherent in the Congress of the United States to repeal a treaty made by the President and Senate. The action of the House of Representatives is in pursuance of that power. The House has chosen its own time, and has chosen the occasion to do this. It has wisely chosen its occasion if it is the purpose of the Congress of the United States to record this American decree that no more Chinese laborers shall come here. It has honorably chosen its attitude upon this question in advance of notice of ratification by China of this treaty, if indeed the treaty is to be ratified.

Now, in considering this matter it is well enough for us to remember that in dealing with Oriental powers in a diplomatic way we always make a very large margin of allowance for their delays. They are proverbially slow, indeed they are diplomatically slow, for it is part of their proverbial philosophy that it is always best to go slow. They are a difficult people to deal with because of their desire to delay and postpone, to see what will turn up.

The Chinese Government, in respect of this treaty and the amendments, being sagacious people, and having just as keen an eye upon the politics of the United States as a Chinaman has upon a dime, following up that policy with most close and assiduous attention always, have doubtless found reasons for delaying this negotiation, for delaying the ratification of that which the Emperor of China expressed through his minister to be his desire, the exclusion of Chinese from the United States. Whether his real reasons are what he said or not makes little difference.

Mr. STEWART. I have no doubt that Chinese are landing every day now.

Mr. MORGAN. Probably they are; I have no doubt they are coming in every day, the Emperor of China not being so desirous now perhaps as he expressed himself to be of restraining that immigration. But the reasons for the delay may reach farther than that. There may be an expectation that the policy of the Government of the United States may be changed in November to such a degree as that Chinese will not only have a right to come here but will have the old Burlingame provisions revived.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator from Alabama one more question? I do not wish to disturb him, but I wish to know his views generally about this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose this bill is passed and sent to the President and becomes a law, as I hope it will, and then it should turn out a week later that China accepts the treaty with the Senate amendments, I ask what in the opinion of the Senator from Alabama would be the legal situation then?

Mr. MORGAN. I did not hear the Senator's question.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose, I say, that we pass this bill and it becomes a law, and suppose a week later, or a month later, or two months later, China assents to the treaty, what would the status be then, without any further legislation? Suppose that the treaty receives the assent of the Chinese Government at a date later than the date of the approval of this bill by the President, would the provisions of this act prevail then, or would the provisions of the treaty prevail then, in the opinion of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MORGAN. There is no doubt about the provisions of this act being paramount to those of any treaty. We can not repeal an act of Congress here by a treaty.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose the ratification is after the approval of the act? I would like to have an answer to that question.

Mr. MORGAN. I am quite willing to advance my opinion at any time on any question that is legitimate or germane to any matter before the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thought this was such a question. I did not ask it merely for fun.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I do not know that I have got the question untangled that the Senator from Oregon put to me.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not know that it was tangled, Mr. President. My proposition was this: Suppose this bill becomes a law, and suppose that after it becomes a law the Chinese assent to the treaty. It then becomes a treaty between the two governments at a date later than the passage of this bill. What I want to know is, whether the provisions of this act would prevail then, or the provisions of the treaty?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Oregon would not have asked that question if he had reflected a moment that it is necessary, in order to make a treaty on our part valid, or binding, or efficacious, that it should be promulgated by proclamation of the President of the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. But suppose it should be promulgated?

Mr. MORGAN. Ah, but it would not be, sir. The President of the United States would never proclaim the treaty after having signed such an act of Congress if he should sign it.

I am sorry to be detained by so many puzzling questions that arise in the mind of the Senator from Oregon. If he would think a little while he would not put me to the trouble. I was about, however, to read a newspaper article here about the Chinese raising flags for Harrison and Morton at No. 923 Race street, Philadelphia, and all that, but I believe I shall not do so.

I have stated this case. When I came into the Senate the other day, having been detained by some personal business that I was very happy to have the opportunity of attending to, I was greatly surprised to find this Chinese bill on its passage in the Senate. I did not understand it. I did not even know that it had passed the House of Representatives. I believe it passed that House the very day it came over here. It was not referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I was greatly surprised to find a bill of this character on its passage here. I knew that there was some powerful impulse moving its passage, and I was informed that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] had moved it.

His great anxiety to exclude the Chinese and prevent them from coming in every day, I suppose, was one of the reasons why he moved it. Perhaps the honorable Senator might have seen that there was some little political advantage to be gained by advocating the movement. I do not know, but I thought that the bill ought to have gone to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I thought it was putting the Senate in a position almost of self-stultification to pass this bill now immediately after we had proposed a negotiation to China which had not been acted upon so far as we knew or had any information.

It looked as if it was rather a bad condition of affairs here. But the Senate of the United States as a treaty-making power is as distinct from the Senate as a legislative power as it can be and consist of the same body of men. It has constitutional functions entirely different. What we do as a treaty-making power in conjunction with the President of the United States is done, of course, ordinarily under the ban of secrecy. We vote upon a treaty here and it requires two-thirds of this body to give its assent to a treaty so that it shall become possible for the President of the United States to proclaim it as part of the law of the land or exchange ratifications with the foreign government, which exchange of ratifications, I will say to the Senator from Oregon, is necessary to validate any treaty, and the President has a right to withhold it if he sees fit. After that vote of two-thirds in favor of its ratification, the President of the United States may change his mind without asking the leave of any human being, and may refuse to exchange ratifications, and therefore it is no treaty. Here we are appealed to by a co-ordinate branch of the National Legislature, as a legislative body, in which a bare majority carries the vote one way or the other.

Now, as far as we can separate ourselves in these two functions, let us try to consider this as a purely legislative question, and let us not allow it to be biased by the fact that we have as a treaty-making tribunal but recently proposed a negotiation to China which has not yet passed into the stage of ratification by that Government; certainly ratifications have not been exchanged. The thing is in a nebulous or chrysalitic state. We are considering this matter now purely with reference to our legislative powers and functions. The question comes, therefore, to us in its most intense form, are we prepared to-day, as a legislative body, to repeal the treaties with China on the subject of the immigration of Chinese laborers into this country?

If that is our judgment, and in that judgment we think we reflect the will of our States and of our people, then it is our duty to vote it, no matter what we have done as a negotiating and treaty-making power in presenting the opportunity to China to come into relations with us of an improved character in respect to the immigration of Chinese laborers into this country. No matter what we have done we must disburden ourselves of that incumbrance and meet this question as legislators, having reference only to the will of the people and the good of the country.

Now, Mr. President, is it for the best that we should vote a law to-day to exclude the Chinese from this country? It is for the best; it has always been for the best that that should be done. There is but one possible obstruction in the way, one possible difficulty to surmount, and that is the fact that we have $25,000,000 worth of trade a year with China, and the abrogation, the repeal by the Congress of the United States of these features of the Burlingame treaty and the treaty of 1880 which relate to the immigration of laborers into this country gives China the full and free opportunity to say that our trade relations with China are determined.

It may even expose our missionaries and other Americans in China to distress. We have citizens over there. I do not hesitate to say that the treaty having been repealed by us in part is abrogated in whole, and that we are entirely at an end with our relations with China, and that whatever is to be done hereafter is to be done de novo.

That will be the situation. I for one am willing to stand it, although I know it is going to injure the trade of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and a good many other Eastern cities if China shall take that view of it. But as I understand, it is the policy of the Emperor of China to exclude his citizens or subjects from immigration to the United States. He makes the point boldly and broadly, and I believe he is sincere.

The people of the Pacific coast were asked the question through their representatives who appeared before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations some few years ago whether they would prefer to sacrifice their interests in the commerce of China, or to have Chinese laborers excluded from the United States. Those statements are all in print and can be had by Senators if they desire to look into them. With one accord, without any exception at all, the Senators and members of the House of Representatives of the Pacific coast, all of whom were present, I believe, except one Senator and one member of the House, said that they preferred to have no commerce with China at all rather than have an influx of Chinese laborers into this country. I was prepared not only to accept their statement as being entirely veracious, but to sympathize with them.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator believes that we were all honest in that statement, then?

Mr. MORGAN. I never said anything to the contrary. I do not impeach a man's honesty every time I speak about him. Acting upon that belief, that it is in accord with the sentiment of the Pacific Slope, believing that the foundation of this movement has the approval in advance of the Emperor of China, I am willing to vote for this bill and take the consequences.

Perhaps if we should wait five years longer or two years longer, this evil might be set upon this country in such a way that we could not get rid of it. I do not know. To my mind it is a fearful question. It is a question of races, and we know how difficult it is to handle such questions when the distinctions are so broad as are those between the Chinaman and the white man. It is a very bad difficulty to get rid of. Oftentimes, yes, almost always, when I turn my mind to the race problem in the South, I feel that I should be willing to make any sacrifices in the world to get rid of the race problem in the South except the honor of the men and women of that country. We will not receive them into our domestic circles and allow them to mingle with our blood and to become the fathers of posterity for white and black alike. But my mind turns on a recollection that has attended me since I was a child, of the terrible difficulties of ever eliminating from a free country like this any great, industrious, powerful race of people, either intellectually or physically, who may find a foothold in our midst.

I therefore sympathize with the people of the western coast most heartily in desiring to lay the ax to the root of the tree and stop that now which hereafter it may be too late a time to stop.

These, Mr. President, are the reasons why I shall vote for this bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I have but a word to say, because I know the anxiety of both sides of the Chamber to dispose of this question to-night.

So far as this treaty is concerned, it seems from statements made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that as it came to the Senate it was written in China, and that as we received it and before it was amended by action of the Senate in accordance with the American interests it was a Chinese treaty. Therefore if in the end we get a treaty which is all in accord with American interests, it will be by reason of the action of the Senate in making amendments which represent whatsoever of interest the American people have in the treaty.

We do not know, Mr. President, whether this treaty as modified will be assented to or not. It is unnecessary, perhaps, that we should know, in reference to our action upon the bill before us. That bill coming from the House of Representatives, and under the circumstances in which it reaches us, everybody must, I think, believe, whether there be official reason for so believing or not, that it emanates from the Executive, that it is supported by the Executive, perhaps has been written by his hand or the hand of his amanuensis, the Secretary of State. We have a right, I think, to infer that.

The bill passed the House of Representatives unanimously and reached the Senate, and has been acted upon by the Senate; and last night it reached the decisive vote taken by the yeas and nays, and the Senator from Alabama did not think it necessary then to ask for delay or inaction on the bill. When the bill first reached the Senate it was suggested that there must have been good reason for the action of the House, in view of the rejection of the treaty, and upon that basis we went on.

I should say further, as a part of the history of the case, that early enough to have been long since responded to the Senate made request for information from the Executive as to whether the treaty had been rejected. There is no response. There has been ample time for it, and silence gives consent. It is acting in bad faith with the Senate to withhold information if the Executive sees that we are acting under a false impression or on a wrong supposition. This bill has now reached a stage when it is beyond modification.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senate receive from the President a statement that he has no information of the rejection of the treaty, will the Senator from New Hampshire vote for or against the bill?

Mr. BLAIR. That question I will dispose of, Mr. President, when the fact arises upon which it is predicated.

Mr. HARRIS. Ah!

Mr. BLAIR. I will answer that question when it shall be a pertinent question. I have something else to say now which is pertinent.

As I was saying, the bill came to us from the House of Representatives. It has now passed the stage of modification in the Senate. If it were now where it could be modified, I should ask leave to move this amendment as an additional section:

SEC. 5. This act shall not take effect for thirty days after its passage, unless before that time the treaty pending between the Emperor of China and the United States shall fail to be ratified and to become a law of the land; but if within thirty days from the passage of this act the said treaty shall have been ratified then this act shall be void.

But, sir, the bill is now beyond modification, and there is no occasion to wait. If we were to have further light, we ought to have received it; and an Executive seeing us misled and acting in good faith (as of course the Executive would act with us) would have answered the question which has been put by formal resolution as to information in the possession of the Executive as to the rejection of the treaty.

And we are to consider further that, assuming the President of the United States to have in his inner consciousness or in possession of the archives of the Government information of the rejection of the treaty, this is none too early to take action. In a former case the President was in possession of a law for more than eighteen months before he saw fit to enter upon its execution. Now, if we enact this bill into a law, we can not expect him to enter upon its execution for eighteen months or two years. It is high time, therefore, for the Senate to pass this bill by a unanimous vote, as it is doing, for who knows but what if there were a single opposing vote it might be made the occasion of withholding the execution of the law even longer than in the other case? The idea of the Executive is that it is his obligation to execute a law eighteen months or two years after it has been enacted, and that the obligation of his official oath does not attach until a very long period of time after the approval of the legislation. So we may well be up and doing, I think, in the passage of this bill.

Another thing. Suppose we do pass the bill, and it reaches the President. Then suppose we have acted under a wrong impression, the President has that favorite remedy, the veto. He can hold the act as long as he pleases. He can allow it to become a law by failing to return it; or he can veto it and thus save us from disaster in any event.

So I have no hesitation whatever in asking for an immediate decision upon the question pending before the Senate. I only wish to call the attention of the Senate to one further aspect of the whole subject which has been developed to my mind in the progress of the debate.

My attention was not directed very early to this subject of Chinese immigration and its effects upon our institutions; only within the last ten years have I thought very much about the subject. That may not be much to my credit, but, sir, I had never studied the situation very much until during the last ten years, and having the impulses of a Republican, and, I think, of an American citizen generally, I felt that it was a mistaken idea to put a restriction upon immigration, thereby closing this great continent to which we have invited all the peoples of the earth for their improvement, that they might be instructed in republicanism and in whatsoever appertained to a higher civilization, that they might participate in the blessings of that civilization if they chose to remain here, and that if they preferred to return to their own land they might go as missionaries, carrying with them every good thing in morals, in education, in industry, in love of liberty, and in all that may go to build up great, free, and prosperous communities in the older countries. That was the way I felt about it, and that was the way the North generally felt about it.

When restrictive legislation was first asked for by the people of the Pacific coast, it was something that I admit struck me as almost running counter to the principles of the Declaration of Independence. It was only upon a closer examination, when I saw that these Chinese people were infinite in number and inferior to our own race, that they would not assimilate with our race, and that they would ultimately overwhelm and drown out our civilization, that I became alarmed; and since that time, as a Republican, and as an Eastern Republican, I have felt that it was indispensable that in some way consistently with good faith we should be able to restrict and to utterly prevent for future time this immigration from China.

So it seemed perfectly natural to me that the great North, with its free institutions and its free spirit, should take the same view of it, and acting under all the circumstances with the feeling that I have explained, the North has come to occupy precisely the same position that our friends of both political parties do on the Pacific coast.

But the point that troubles me most is how our friends on the other side of the Chamber should apparently have the same feeling that we have about it. The Democratic party upon the Pacific coast was first in favor of Chinese immigration. Now upon that coast and all over the country it seems to be opposed to it, though not a Democrat has risen on this floor to advocate this bill or to advocate any other bill restricting Chinese immigration during the session of Congress, so far as I remember. All those who have opposed it from the Democratic party have been our friends from the South, and I could not understand why they should be so exceedingly ardent and eager opponents of immigration which was doing injury to civilization in the North and West and feeling about this subject precisely as the Republicans did. That I could not understand. But in looking over this book on Chinese immigration, which I notice is continually referred to by our friends on the other side, I found what I thought might be the explanation. It is in the testimony of Governor Low, of California, to be found on the seventy-sixth page of this book.

He was governor of the State, and had been for three years and a half or four years our minister to China. He had also been a United States consul, I believe, and had held other positions of importance, and was summoned before this committee and questioned. I find some questions put to him by Mr. Pixley, representing, I think, the Chinese side of the subject. Mr. Sargent had been questioning Governor Low, and then Mr. Pixley, referring to the year 1869, put to him these questions:

By Mr. PIXLEY:

Q. That was the year of Koopmanschap, was it not?

A. Yes; the year of Koopmanschap. They were going to bring over any quantity of coolies to supplant the negroes on the plantations, and some experiments were tried, I think, with very ill results.

Q. I understood it to be a failure?

A. They did not pay the Chinamen; that was the cause of the failure, and the Chinamen quit.

Mr. President, I do not read that to raise a laugh, because this is too serious a matter; but it lets in a flood of light upon my darkened mind. I always like to see through a thing before I act upon it, and I derived this information in the shade of night. When deep sleep had fallen, no doubt, upon most members of the Senate I got this book, and reading it by my candle, I came across that passage, and it illustrated what had been to me the most troublesome problem presented by this entire debate. The Irishmen, the common laborers of the North, found that the Chinaman could underbid them every time. He was a cheaper laborer. He would go just far enough below the standard of wages to take the job every time and to starve the Irishman and the laborer of the North. He inevitably dragged down our civilization. There were 400,000,000 of them, you know, and of course it was simply a question of life and death to the whole Northern civilization.

But how was it when you came to the South? Koopmanschap and others introduced Chinamen. We all recollect the accounts of the efforts and the failure of the experiments. What was the difficulty? The Chinaman demanded his pay, and if he underbid the still cheaper labor of the colored man, he was coming here in multitudes, but he would have his pay, and by rejecting him and driving him out our Southern friends were able to preserve their colored labor with its existing cheapness, costing them nothing in the world but its mere sustenance, just enough to keep them in good order as a labor-producing machine, and they were free from Chinese competition. To be sure it is a hundred thousand who are permitted to remain in the country, but that does not occasion them any trouble. However, if you permit Chinese immigration to the United States we shall not have the six or eight million people, which is the number of colored laborers you now depend upon. The Chinaman can come in like a flood and drive out the negro, and supply in fact the whole country and extirpate the laborer both North and South.

There, I think, is the real secret why the instinct of our friends who owned the labor of the South before the war and during the war and since the war has driven them to take the position on this subject which the North has attained by strong conviction and a benevolent regard for the real interests of the laborers of the land, because the Chinese could not be naturalized and could do no voting.

There is another point to be considered. If the Chinaman were the laborer of the South would not the negro be driven out and be deprived of his inestimable right of suffrage? There are many things to be thought of about this question, but the real secret of it all, it seems to me at least, is this, and I shall read it once more in order that it may impress itself upon the minds of the laboring people of the North, for it is well for them to understand the motives of their friends who are so strongly the opponents of Chinese immigration to-day.

They were going to bring over any quantity of coolies to supplant the negroes on the plantations, and some experiments were tried, I think with very ill results.

Q. I understood it to be a failure.

A. They did not pay the Chinamen; that was the cause of the failure, and the Chinamen quit.

To be sure the Chinaman should have got his pay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass? Is the Senate ready for the question? The yeas and nays having been ordered, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PASCO (when Mr. FAULKNER'S name was called). The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If the Senator from West Virginia were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is necessarily absent from the Senate. The Senator from Indiana, if here, would vote for the bill. I suppose the Senator from Vermont would also vote for the bill, but I do not know. However, I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont to the Senator from Indiana, and record my vote for the bill. I vote "yea."

I desire to say while I am on the floor, as the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] is not present, that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] would vote "yea," if he were here. I suppose the Senator from Maine would also vote "yea," but I do not know as to that.

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], but I understand and have reason to believe that he would vote "yea" if he were here. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. I understand that he would vote "yea," if he were here, and therefore I shall vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL], but after the assurances received yesterday from his colleague [Mr. CULLOM] that he would vote "yea," if present, I record my vote "yea."

Mr. CAMERON (when Mr. QUAY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. QUAY] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], but I am assured that he would vote "yea," if present, and therefore I vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. My colleague [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa] is necessarily absent, and is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], who, I suppose, if here, would vote for the bill.

Mr. GRAY. I am free to say that if my colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON. Therefore I shall allow my vote "yea" to stand.

Mr. MORGAN. I have a pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], but his colleague [Mr. HISCOCK] yesterday stated that if the senior Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] were present he would vote "yea" upon this bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have no doubt he would.

Mr. MORGAN. All right, then. My vote in the affirmative will stand.

Mr. PADDOCK. My colleague [Mr. MANDERSON] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] authorized me to state that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] returned to his home in Vermont for two or three days, and I am informed that he is unavoidably detained there for this week.

Mr. PUGH. I was requested to state that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] would vote "yea" if he were not absent and paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. I suppose both Senators would vote "yea."

Mr. COCKRELL. As I announced yesterday, I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. We were to leave the question of observing the pair to his colleague [Mr. PLATT]. I do not know how the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] would vote, and his colleague informed me yesterday that he did not know how he would vote. I should vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. STEWART. Let the pair be transferred to some one else.

Mr. PLATT. Of course I can not say positively how my colleague would vote, for I was not advised upon this matter, but I think I shall take the responsibility of relieving the Senator from Missouri from his pair with him.

Mr. COCKRELL. Under the circumstances, then, I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER. My colleague [Mr. BOWEN] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea." The Senator from Florida is at liberty to vote, if he chooses.

Mr. BLODGETT. I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], but I understand that he favors this bill and therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. BLAIR. If my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] were here, he would vote "yea." He is unavoidably detained from the Senate for a few days.

Mr. CHACE. My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is detained from the Senate on business of the Senate. I feel assured that if he were here he would favor this bill. I understand that he is paired, I can not say with whom.

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 0; as follows:

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Missouri wait a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Wait a moment and see if we can not fix a time to take the vote.

Mr. VEST. Very well.

Mr. STEWART. I ask the unanimous consent of those present that a vote be taken on the bill immediately after the morning business to-morrow, without debate so far as those who are here are concerned.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. TELLER. Say 1 o'clock.

Mr. STEWART. I will ask that the vote be taken at 1 o'clock, without debate so far as those present are concerned. We can not bind those who are not present.

Mr. TELLER. There is a quorum here.

Mr. STEWART. As there is a quorum here I will ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken at 1 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that to-morrow at 1 o'clock the vote shall be taken on the question shall the bill pass, without further debate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and——

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator from Nevada propose that the vote shall be taken to-morrow without any debate at all?

Mr. STEWART. The debate can go on previous to 1 o'clock. I propose that the vote shall be taken at 1 o'clock.

Mr. TELLER. The debate will be previous to 1 o'clock.

Mr. VEST. When will the bill be taken up?

Mr. STEWART. It will be taken up immediately after the morning business.

Mr. TELLER. If the time to vote is fixed at 1 o'clock we should take up the bill earlier than that hour if anybody wishes to speak on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear suggestions from any Senators.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that the bill be taken up in the morning immediately after the disposition of the routine morning business.

Mr. TELLER. And that the vote be taken at 1 o'clock.

Mr. COCKRELL. And that the vote be taken at 1 o'clock.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will then again state the request of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. HOAR. I understood that unanimous consent had been given to that request. The Chair so announced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before it had been formally agreed upon the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] interposed a suggestion that some debate ought to be permitted, and the Senator from Nevada then modified his suggestion.

Mr. HOAR. I supposed the Chair had announced the first suggestion as agreed to; but if the Chair understood it otherwise it is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The suggestion now is that unanimous consent be given to the consideration of the bill at the close of the routine morning business to-morrow, and that the vote on the question shall the bill pass be taken at 1 o'clock. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the executive business I am anxious to have disposed of will not take two minutes, and I shall not seek to prolong the executive session.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, September 7, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, September 6, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. J. H. CUTHBERT, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

NICHOLAS J. BIGLEY.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the Senate bill 3074, for the relief of Nicholas J. Bigley, was referred to the Committee on Claims. The same bill has been reported by the Committee on War Claims, and I ask by unanimous consent the bill be returned by the Committee on Claims and that it lie on the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CATHOLIC CHURCH OF ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1073) for the relief of the Roman Catholic Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, at Chattanooga, Tenn., with a Senate amendment.

Mr. NEAL. This is a mere verbal amendment, and I hope it will be agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate was agreed to.

RETURN OF BILL TO SENATE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, September 4, 1888.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate House bill 5716, for establishing a light at the mouth of Otter Creek, Lake Champlain.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this request will be agreed to, and the bill will be returned to the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MONTGOMERY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. JOHN R. BROWN, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BUCHANAN, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

PATRICK H. WINSTON, JR.

Mr. OATES. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Claims from the further consideration of the bill (S. 212) for the relief of Patrick H. Winston, jr.; and that it be considered in the House at this time. I would ask leave to state what the object of the bill is in one minute's time.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 212) for the relief of Patrick H. Winston, jr.

Mr. OATES. That Senate bill was referred to the Committee on Claims. Prior to that a bill in the same language was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to this House in favor of this claimant, and that is the reason why I ask that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. McCREARY. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Patrick H. Winston, jr., out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000, for legal services rendered by him in the defense of Tom Hill, a captain of the Indian police of the Nez Percé Agency, Idaho Territory, charged with the killing of the Indian Nine Pipes, said services having been rendered by the request of Mr. Charles Monteith, United States agent at the Nez Percé reservation, and of Hon. Norman Buck, judge of the first judicial district of Idaho Territory.

Mr. OATES. I desire to say to the House that this gentleman was employed to defend this case by the direction of the Attorney-General, and the Attorney-General recommends that this bill be paid. It is reasonable and was approved by the Department, and has been considered by the Judiciary Committee of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OATES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the House bill upon the same subject will be laid upon the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING, STERLING, ILL.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1940) to provide for the construction of a public building at Sterling, Ill., and that the same may be considered at this time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, or acquire by condemnation proceedings or otherwise, a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building for the accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices at the city of Sterling, in the State of Illinois; and plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed, for the site and building complete, the sum of $100,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site of said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Illinois shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site, nor plan for said building, shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $100,000 for site and building.

The amendment proposed is:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $40,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purpose provided in this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I desire to make a statement. This is not a fancy building. The amount is only $40,000; a sum necessary to make a good substantial post-office building in a very flourishing city, where the post-office receipts are now more than $13,000 and the net receipts amount to more than $8,000.

Mr. McCREARY. How much has already been appropriated?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Nothing at all. This is the first appropriation proposed, and is only $40,000. The necessity for this building is shown by the report. The fact is the Post-Office Department can not obtain a suitable building for the post-office in Sterling at any reasonable rent.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is there a court held there?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. There is no court at present in Sterling for which this building would be used.

Mr. McMILLIN. What rent is paid for the building that is now being used there?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. The rent now paid is about $800 for an unsuitable building, and the Post-Office Department has been offering to pay $1,200, and can not obtain a suitable building for that sum.

Mr. McMILLIN. We have passed already an enormous number of public buildings bills.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Not one for the State of Illinois.

Mr. McMILLIN. While I am disposed not to make any captious opposition, where the question has come to divide the responsibility with each individual member, I think this matter has been drawn out a long way this session, and I shall have to object to this bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCREARY. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of the committees for reports.

Mr. McCREARY. I move to dispense with the call of committees for reports, and that members having reports to submit may be permitted to file them with the Clerk for reference.

The motion was agreed to, and the morning hour was dispensed with

MRS. GENERAL WARD B. BURNETT.

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire to call up the special order for this morning on a pension bill.

The SPEAKER. There is a special order for this morning, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate bill 681, a bill granting an increase of pension to Mrs. General Ward B. Burnett.

Mr. STRUBLE. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes time on this special order.

There was no objection.

Mr. STRUBLE. Presuming there are those present who do not know the exact status of the bill, I desire to say that the question is a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the engrossment and third reading of the bill was denied. Mr. Speaker, I would like, on behalf of this beneficiary, that this motion may prevail. If it does prevail I give notice that I will make a motion to reduce the amount provided for in this bill from $100 to $75, and I would like the bill then to go to the question of its passage as many of these other bills have gone before it.

Mr. McCREARY. If the bill to which the gentleman from Iowa refers was set for consideration to-day, I ask unanimous consent to postpone its consideration for one week.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has submitted a motion, as the Chair understands, to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the bill indicated by him to a third reading. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to reconsider that vote, and the gentleman states that his purpose is to move to amend the bill by striking out $100 and inserting $75, as the rate of pension. The motion to reconsider is a privileged motion——

Mr. McCREARY. It is so important that we go on with the bill which we had under consideration yesterday until we complete it, that I am compelled to ask unanimous consent that the bill to which the gentleman from Iowa refers be postponed for one week.

Mr. STRUBLE. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] to consent to a vote on this motion, and then I will agree that the consideration of the bill may go over until next Thursday, if he desires.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would ask the gentleman from Iowa whether this is not one of that class of bills that have been set down for consideration and postponed two or three times already?

Mr. STRUBLE. It is; but it stands on different ground from those, being under a special order of the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I would suggest that the gentleman comply with the request of the gentleman from Kentucky and let the bill go over until a future day, when it can come up for consideration with other similar bills.

Mr. BLAND. We refused to consider some private bills yesterday in the interest of a great public measure, and I hope the House will adhere to that course.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAND. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the bill indicated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] be postponed for one week, and the gentleman from Missouri objects. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAND. Oh, no. What I want to do is to postpone it.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider called up by the gentleman from Iowa is a privileged motion, and the gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the bill to which the motion refers be postponed for one week. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. STRUBLE. I should like to have a vote this morning upon the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

Mr. STRUBLE. I would like to have a vote on the motion to reconsider, so as to have the bill placed in a position where it can be put upon its passage; and if the gentleman from Kentucky will consent to take the vote now on the motion to reconsider, I will not further detain the House to-day.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from Kentucky for unanimous consent to postpone the consideration of the bill indicated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] for one week is objected to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Who objects?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE,] in charge of the bill.

Mr. STRUBLE. I would like to have a vote now upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. MCCREARY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move to postpone the further consideration of the motion to reconsider until next Thursday, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. MCCREARY, and there were—ayes 50, noes 48.

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

[Mr. BRUMM withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I must confess the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] have somewhat surprised me. But considering the fact, sir, that he has just been renominated in his district, possibly campaign literature from a Republican point of view may not be very effective when he goes home to meet his constituents, and that it was essentially necessary for him, whether confining himself to the truth or not, he should go home with a new issue and one he thought might possibly give him a notoriety which he would not otherwise have.

What was the cause, Mr. Speaker, of the issue between the gentleman and myself on this floor, and how has he, as a Representative and a man of honor, conducted it here? He, during my absence from this House, charged me with having employed Pinkerton detectives. This was a direct charge, specific, with no ambiguity about it. Subsequently he fell from Pinkerton detectives to the Coal and Iron police. Well, there was another specific charge. But when I returned and the matter was called to my attention I said I would bring him before the bar of this House to answer that charge. And I intended to have done so, but on account of the important questions here for consideration, and the time of the House being so valuable, though I knew the gentleman had made a statement that was absolutely false and which I will in the next ten minutes prove to be so, I thought I would rather stand his accusation against me than take up the time of this House, so valuable to the country.

Now, sir, let us come down to the real facts. The first charge the gentleman made against me was that I had employed Pinkerton detectives, and next that I had employed the Coal and Iron police of the Reading Railroad. Let us see who has been employing detectives there. I ask the gentleman to listen to this.

Mr. BRUMM. I am listening.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Free Press, Minersville, Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania.]

That Congressman BRUMM is inconsistent and hypocritical is borne out by his almost every action. An instance in connection with his recent denunciation of the Coal and Iron police comes to mind. It will be remembered that during the campaign last fall Mr. BRUMM made a speech in Mountaineer Hall, when he highly eulogized our townsman Captain Levan, who was the Fusion candidate for recorder. Among other things, he said in substance, "Some people object to our friend Levan because he is a Coal and Iron policeman. Why, sirs, that is a silly objection. Coal and Iron policemen are neccessary to the preservation of peace and good order in the community—

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side of the House]— and I say to you that I went to Harrisburg and asked for his appointment myself.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman deny that?

Mr. BRUMM. No, I do not deny it. [Laughter.]

The Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

Of course Captain Levan and his friends were present and "took it in," knowing that in a score of speeches previously delivered in the patches throughout the county Mr. BRUMM had purposely failed to give "our friend Levan" any such send-off. Well, the point is Mr. BRUMM did say Coal and Iron policemen are necessary, etc., and yet only a few months after making the assertion he gets up in Congress and pitches into Coal and Iron policemen and bitterly denounces Messrs. SCOTT and COXE, two of the many coal operators, for contributing to a common fund to pay these officers. Think of the inconsistency! Denouncing operators for employing and paying a man that he himself asked to have employed and paid!

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BRUMM. The only difference is——

Mr. SCOTT. No——

Mr. BRUMM. You asked me a question; let me answer it.

Mr. SCOTT. No, no; keep your seat. I am not done with you—I have not begun with you yet.

Mr. BRUMM. You asked me a question; do you refuse to let me answer it? [Cries of "Sit down!" on the Democratic side.] You had better try to make me; any of you.

Mr. SCOTT. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I wish to reiterate it, has made a charge against me that I was employing policemen, and he has read some affidavits in which possibly those policemen may have been employed as he states; but I will show him how they were employed and for what reason they were employed. The gentleman has referred and has called the attention of the House specially to Holden Chester. Holden Chester was at one time superintendent of the Mineral Railroad and Mining Company, in which I never had any interest, and it is essential the House should keep this in view, but he resigned that position and was afterwards hired by me to take a position in my company, the Union Coal Company. When those policemen were appointed to the Coal and Mineral Railroad and Mining Company, Mr. Chester was acting in another capacity and not in my employ. Listen to what he has to say.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, County of Northumberland, ss:

Personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for said county, Holden Chester, who, after being duly sworn according to law, deposeth and saith that he is a resident of the borough of Shamokin, in the county and State aforesaid, and has been for more than fifteen years last past and is and has been for several years superintendent of the Union Coal Company, a corporation in which Hon. WILLIAM L. SCOTT is largely interested, and that as such superintendent it is his duty to and he does employ and discharge the men employed in, around, and connected with the coal mines and collieries in the said county of Northumberland, carried on and operated by the said Union Coal Company under this deponent as superintendent as aforesaid. And this deponent further says that as such superintendent he has never employed any Coal and Iron police or detectives in, around, or connected with the said coal mines or collieries, and that the said Union Coal Company has not contributed to the support of, nor had in its employ, any Coal and Iron police or detectives since he has acted as superintendent as aforesaid to the knowledge of this deponent, and he would have known it had there been any such contribution made or any Coal and Iron police or detectives so employed.

HOLDEN CHESTER.

Sworn and subscribed to before me this 28th day of May, A. D. 1888.

[SEAL.] W. E. ZIMMERMAN, Notary Public.

Mr. SCOTT. I also ask the Clerk to read this letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE UNION COAL COMPANY.
Shamokin, Pa., May 28, 1888.

DEAR SIR: We inclose affidavit and further state that the only thing that can possibly be construed to our employing any police whatever will be found in the following facts:

The Pennsylvania colliery, situated about 7 miles east of this point—where we pay all hands working at our other two collieries—therefore to avoid the expense and loss of time to our men at this Pennsylvania colliery in causing them to come to this office for their pay, we carry it to them semi-monthly, and it being 7 miles along a lonely and uninhabited road to said colliery, we frequently take one of our town constables with us, or if none are at hand, one of the town police, and pay them for such service generally $1.50 for the trip. This has nothing whatever to do with what are termed the "Coal and Iron police" employed throughout the coal region. They are employed by the Reading Coal and Iron Company, and I am creditably informed that to pay for their service a small percentage is charged upon the tonnage of all coal shipped by this company, as well as all coal shipped by individuals working upon their lands.

This we have nothing whatever to do with, as we neither work upon their land or ship any coal over their road, or pay anything to the support of such "Coal and Iron police."

Yours respectfully,

HOLDEN CHESTER,
Superintendent.

Hon. W. L. SCOTT, Washington, D. C.

Mr. SCOTT. I would call the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] has produced no affidavits here and made no statements substantiating his original charge in connection with my having employed Pinkerton's detectives or the Reading Coal and Iron police. His original charge against me was that I had employed Pinkerton's detectives. The gentleman has the right that any other member on this floor has to participate in debate; but there is always a courtesy when a personal dispute is going on, or a controversy between one member and another—for it is reasonable to suppose that each is capable of taking care of himself—that a third party having no interest in the matter can not with propriety interject himself. If he does, for what; for the purpose of notoriety? [Laughter.] Did the gentleman from Pennsylvania confine himself to the truth, even when he undertook to interfere in a personal matter where he had no interest? He told a falsehood at that time; because he must admit that he has not now substantiated his charge—my employment of Pinkerton's detectives. He then fell down, as I have said, to the Coal and Iron police.

Now, sir, the gentleman leaves his own bailiwick, and he undertakes to cover the State of Pennsylvania, and he straddles the Allegheny Mountains [laughter], and we find him on the Youghiogheny River, some three to five hundred miles away from his district. To make any kind of a case, or supposed case, he found it essential to go over there; and he did not make very much there, as I will show. And then he takes a turn northward, and we find him in the city of Erie, around my rolling mills and down on my docks, and he reads a lot of extracts here from newspapers, probably Republican ex parte statements, and personal letters that nobody under heaven could ever trace the author of, and which he declines to name, and then asks this House to accept these statements as facts!

Now I will tell the gentleman about the ejectments at my property at Erie, and I can furnish affidavits for the statement. The men employed at my rolling-mill there struck, and I signed the article and gave them the notice read by the gentleman. That mill from the day of that strike never turned another wheel. The previous year in the operations of that mill I had sunk between $30,000 and $40,000. It is not necessary for me to go into an explanation of these business matters. The House is not interested in them; but I will say this to the gentleman, that of the thirty houses—and that has been some years ago—on that property——

Mr. BRUMM (interrupting). One of them being a stable, I believe.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. BRUMM. And huddling the people together in such quarters.

Mr. SCOTT. No, sir; that is not true. They are good houses, and the stable was never used for other than stable purposes.

Mr. BRUMM. I have some evidence on that point.

Mr. SCOTT. And from the time of that strike never was there an ejectment made from one of these houses; the families of the men remaining in them for over eighteen months without the payment of one single cent of rent, and I kept most of them in coal and in food. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.] I will substantiate that statement; and I believe, sir, that there are some of the families there to-day, and they have never paid one cent of rent. And those are pretty good houses, too.

Now, that is an answer to you, sir, and your statement, and what you have just read, and it can all be verified. Now we will go down with you to the Youghiogheny River with your "pluck me" stores.

Mr. Speaker, employing, as I do, at these mines from twenty-five hundred to thirty-five hundred men, and furnishing homes for their families, it is almost impossible to make out the pay-rolls weekly. But the system there is this: Every two weeks these pay-rolls are made out, and at the end of two weeks every man comes up and gets his cash. But the families of these men during these two weeks—they are not a provident class—need to go to the store. That property is under my control, and no store can be erected within a mile or more of the mines except it is on the property. I do not propose to let gin shops and other such institutions come in there. But the miners have their money, and are paid every two weeks. These order-books which the gentleman has referred to are issued this way: The wife of one of these miners can come and get a book for $5. We do not want to keep accounts with her or with her husband. They go to the store and they take off a 1-cent ticket or a 25-cent or a 50-cent ticket, get what they want, and come away. At the end of the two weeks whatever they have not used of that book is brought in, and they get the cash for it. Now I am nearly done——

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. There is nothing of compulsion in the matter?

Mr. SCOTT. Not a particle of it.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. And they are not compelled to do their trading at these stores?

Mr. SCOTT. Not at all. They are not required to spend a cent there. They may keep the book, and if they do not use any portion of it they can get the entire amount for it at the end of the time. They are not under compulsion to take the books, which were designed merely for their convenience.

Now, sir, I desire to have this affidavit read, and this will practically end what I have to say.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, County of Allegheny, ss:

Before me, the subscriber, a notary public in and for said county, personally appeared James Matthews, who being duly sworn according to law doth depose and say that he has been the superintendent of the Scott Haven coal mines since the commencement of operations in the month of April, 1878; that at the time the Scott Haven mines were open, and for a long time prior thereto, the coal mines known as the Penn Gas coal mines and the Westmoreland Coal Company mines, near to the Scott Haven mines, had been worked and operated and were and now are the leading coal mines with which the Scott Haven mines came in competition in the market, the coal in the three several mines being of the same grade and quality and found sale in the same market.

That in April, 1878, the Scott Haven mines were about to be opened and it was agreed that the miners should be paid from time to time the same wages as might be from time to time by the Penn Gas Coal Company and the Westmoreland Coal Company.

In August, 1878, there was a general depression in the coal business and reductions were made in wages by the Penn Gas Coal Company and the Westmoreland Coal Company at their mines, and then the Scott Haven mines made a reduction from 2½ to 2 cents per bushel. At this time a strike took place for a short time, when the men resumed work for 2 cents per bushel, the same price as was paid by the Penn Gas Coal Company and the Westmoreland Coal Company.

In October, 1879, the miners at Scott Haven struck for an advance from 2½ to 3 cents per bushel, which strike continued to the latter part of November. During this strike the miners at the Penn Gas Coal Company and the Westmoreland Coal Company's mines were at work for 2½ cents per bushel. Work was resumed at the Scott Haven Mines at 2½ cents per bushel. Four of the miners who refused to work at the price paid by the Westmoreland Coal Company and the Penn Gas Coal Company at their mines, after several days longer notice to vacate than legally required, were ejected and other men employed by the company went into the possession of these houses. The families ejected moved into vacant houses in the neighborhood without any other or further inconvenience than ordinarily takes place in moving a short distance. Three of these men, James Farrow, George Fine, and George Haden, afterwards were taken back into the employ of the company owning the Scott Haven Mines, at the same time returning with their families to the houses of the company, where they have remained ever since, and they are living there to-day. The other, whom I think was George Ashoff, lives in the vicinity and has been working in the Scott Haven Mines ever since.

On April 15, 1882, the miners at Scott Haven struck for an advance to 4 cents per bushel. This strike continued to June of the same year, when work was resumed at 3½ cents. During this strike the miners at the Penn Gas Coal Company's mines and the Westmoreland Coal Company's mines were paid and at work at 3½ cents per bushel.

In February, 1884, the miners at Scott Haven struck on account of a reduction from 3½ to 3 cents per bushel. This strike continued for about thirty days, when the men went to work at 3 cents per bushel. During this strike the miners at Penn Gas Coal Company and Westmoreland Coal Company mines were at work at 3 cents per bushel.

In February, 1885, a strike took place on account of a reduction from 3 to 2½ cents per bushel, which continued to April 29. For some months prior to this the Scott Haven mines continued to pay 3 cents after the Penn and Westmoreland Company mines had reduced the wages to 2½ cents. Work was resumed at 2½ cents per bushel. About 20th March, 1888, men at Scott Haven mines struck for an advance to 2¾ cents, and the men at Penn and Westmoreland struck for an advance from 50 to 60 cents per ton. Scott Haven mines granted the advance, upon which terms the men continued to work during the month of May. The miners at the Penn Gas Coal Company and Westmoreland Coal Company mines remained out until June, and then resumed work at 55 cents per ton. The Scott Haven mines then asked a reduction to 55 cents per ton, when a strike occurred which continued until August, when the men went to work at 55 cents per ton.

In January, 1888, the miners at Scott Haven struck for an advance to 60 cents per ton, which strike continued until about the middle of March, when the men resumed work at 60 cents per ton—the same price as offered them at the beginning of the strike. During this strike the miners at the Penn Gas Coal Company and the Westmoreland Company miners were at work at 60 cents per ton.

The managers of the owners of the Scott Haven mines have never refused to employ men because of their connection with the Knights of Labor or because of membership in that or any other organization, but on the contrary, Knights of Labor have from time to time worked at the Scott Haven mines, and many of the miners now at work in said mines are Knights of Labor.

Pinkerton detectives have never at any time been employed or in any way or manner used at or about the Scott Haven mines. James Mathews, superintendent of the mines, John F. Hosack, assistant superintendent, W. W. Burlingham, tipple-hand, and Adam Trost, stable boss, constitute the only police force ever known in or about the Scott Haven premises who simply hold police power by commision from the governor of Pennsylvania and are known as a part of the coal and iron police under a law of the State of Pennsylvania.

These men deponent says he had appointed on his own responsibility to protect the company's property from trespasses, but they have never made a single arrest or interfered in any way whatsoever with the liberties of any one.

Since the commencement of mining operations at the Scott Haven mines in April, 1878, not one ton of coal has been therein mined at a less price than has been paid by their neighbors and competitors, the Penn Gas Coal Company and the Westmoreland Coal Company, while on two occasions the Scott Haven mines paid a higher and better price than was paid by the said Penn Gas-Coal Company and the Westmoreland Coal Company.

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, County of Allegheny, ss:

Before me, the subscriber, a notary public in and for said county, personally appeared John F. Hosack, who being by me duly sworn according to law doth depose and say that he is the assistant superintendent of the Scott Haven mines and has been since the commencement of operations at said mines in April, 1878, and that he is acquainted with the statements made in the above and foregoing affidavits of James Mathews, and that the same are true and correct to the best of his knowledge and belief.

JOHN F. HOSACK.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 29th day of May, 1888.
[SEAL.] JAS. V. McMASTERS, Alderman.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I can briefly and in a very few words explain that affidavit.

Mr. BRUMM. Both of these parties are your superintendents or your employés.

Mr. SCOTT. They are superintendents or officers. That whole statement in the affidavit there gives a succinct history of every strike that ever occurred at that property (there are about three thousand men working there) and how it was settled, and the wages paid. I call the attention of the House to the fact that this is the same property in regard to which I furnished evidence of what the wage-workingmen in the unprotected industries of the country were receiving as compared with the wages paid by the protected industries of the country; and it was a comparison of the wage-working skilled miners at this property which I made with the wage-workers of the Carnegie property. I showed that while these men working in these mines were earning from $4 to $5 a day (and I took up fifty of them), Carnegie & Co. were paying their men, protected as they were from 55 to 103 per cent., an average of $2.50 a day; and that is the main difficulty with the gentleman here and his friends on the other side. Now I will close this case, for it is nonsense to go further. But I want to say here that there are two big coal companies there. I will ask my friend from Pittsburgh [Mr. BAYNE], is there any bigger coal company in that section than the Westmoreland and Penn?

Mr. BAYNE. I think not.

Mr. SCOTT. My property is as large as both of them combined, and we are contiguous. I can go under-ground from my property into theirs. We are competitors in the market. What was the agreement which the gentleman read here? It was simply this, that whatever wages the Penn and Westmoreland Company paid for mining coal I would pay; that, if the Penn and Westmoreland men struck and my men were working at a fixed rate of 60 cents a ton, say, and the strike of the Penn and Westmoreland men lasted a year and they went in afterwards at 70 cents, I agreed to pay every man for that past year's work 10 cents a ton more on all the coal that they had mined. But what does the affidavit show? It shows for a period of three years that, although I had that agreement, I paid out over $30,000 to these men in excess of the prices received by the Penn and Westmoreland miners.

Mr. Speaker, it is hardly necessary, I think, in my own defense, to say much more on this subject. I hope that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] returns to his constituency, when he undertakes to explain to them this charge, he will at least take these affidavits along with him, and my answer, and particularly will not forget the newspaper part of it relating to himself and his recommendation in regard to the Reading Coal and Iron policemen, and present it fairly and squarely when he gets on the stump. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I reserve the balance of the time.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman flies from facts to quibbling all through his remarks.

Mr. SCOTT. Is the gentleman entitled to the floor now?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes of his time remaining.

[Mr. BRUMM withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask unanimous consent that the consideration hour be dispensed with. I make this request in order that I may call up House bill 11309, commonly called the retaliation bill, so that we may proceed with its consideration and, if possible, complete it to-day.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I would not object, Mr. Speaker, but for the fact that my committee has a bill hung up here as unfinished business.

Mr. McCREARY. You can go on with that to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not go on with it to-morrow except by consent of the House. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I feel bound to object, Mr. Speaker, because there are very important matters awaiting consideration.

Mr. McMILLIN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McMILLIN. This bill having been privileged to be reported at any time the privilege goes to its consideration at any time, and my inquiry is whether or no a motion to proceed to its consideration would now be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. It is simply a special order, and the Chair thinks that unless expressly ordered by the House the bill does not come up except when general legislation of that character comes up, but it would then have preference over all other matters. The call for the consideration of bills rests with the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department having been passed over.

A MEMBER. They reserved their time.

The SPEAKER. But the question is—and it has never been determined heretofore—whether a committee can break in on an hour which is actually occupied by another committee, or whether it must wait until the consideration hour, or some part of it, is unoccupied. It is of course entirely immaterial to the Chair.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. When the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department was called, the chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON], was absent from the Hall, and I asked that the committee be passed over, not losing its right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stands corrected. The business of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures was completed and the call now rests with the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, which has an unfinished bill pending. The hour begins at eight minutes past 2. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1548) to increase the efficiency of the medical division of the Pension Bureau.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was under consideration on a previous day, I reserved my time. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] asked for the floor in order to have some matter read, and I will now yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] has the floor in his own right.

Mr. CHEADLE. The gentleman has an hour, if he sees proper to occupy it.

Mr. TAULBEE. Who has an hour, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON].

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAULBEE. My point is that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] is not entitled to the floor, and that when the hour expired the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] had the floor in his own right.

The SPEAKER. If that is the fact, the gentleman from Indiana is of course now entitled to the floor. The present occupant of the chair was not presiding at that time.

Mr. CHEADLE. When this bill was last up for consideration, I secured the floor to oppose the bill about one minute before the expiration of the hour. I sent to the desk a newspaper article to be read, and one or two words of it had been read. I desire the remainder of that article to be read now. I had recognition in my own right on the bill.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I having reserved my time, and having charge of the bill, and having a whole hour, how could the gentleman get the floor in his own right?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee could not reserve his time unless he vacated the floor temporarily at least. The gentleman from Indiana states that he had the floor in his own right, and had sent to the Clerk's desk a paper, a part of which had been read when the hour expired.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Will the Chair pardon me a moment? The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] yielded to the gentleman from Indiana to have a paper read. He did not yield the floor.

The SPEAKER. The official record should show what occurred. The Chair will cause it to be examined. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] will state his point.

Mr. TAULBEE. My point of order has been somewhat obviated by what has transpired since I rose to make the point. But I will now make a statement for the information of the gentleman from Indiana who was on the floor at the time the hour expired. There was an arrangement between the then occupant of the chair and some gentlemen who are inclined to oppose this bill, that one of three gentlemen, among whom was myself, should be recognized in opposition to the measure. The gentleman from Indiana rose and stated that he desired to have a certain matter read from a newspaper, and he sent it up.

The Clerk proceeded to read. I made the point of order that the matter read was not pertinent to the issue, and that it was due to the opponents of this bill that time should not be consumed upon matter which did not relate to the question before the House. The point of order was not decided when the hour arrived.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The present occupant of the chair has no control over it. The gentleman from Tennessee, if he desires to have the consideration of the bill proceed, must make the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] who was presiding in Committee of the Whole on this bill is absent from the city. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] will please take the chair.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HATCH in the chair) and resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 1548) to increase the efficiency of the medical division of the Pension Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds on examination of the RECORD that when this bill was last under consideration and before the committee rose the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] had the floor. The Chair will be compelled under the rules to recognize him.

Mr. WASHINGTON. The gentleman from Indiana was on the floor because I yielded to him. I had not relinquished my right to the floor, but yielded to the gentleman to have an article read from a newspaper.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause that part of the RECORD to be read. The RECORD does not show that the gentleman from Tennessee yielded the floor, but that the gentleman from Indiana took the floor in his own right.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Let the RECORD be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WASHINGTON. Unless some gentleman desires to be heard on the other side of this question, I shall ask for a vote.

Mr. TAULBEE. I want to be heard on it myself.

Mr. ROGERS. And several of us.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Indiana desires to be heard and was on the floor.

Mr. CHEADLE. I desire to have read as a part of my remarks an article from the New York Tribune, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk proceeded to read as follows:

"CAN SUCH THINGS BE?—HERE IS A PLAIN DUTY OF CONGRESS—PUBLIC FUNDS FOR CAMPAIGN USES—A PLAIN VIOLATION OF LAW—CLEVELAND'S VETOES TO BE DEFENDED—WHAT WILL IT COST?

"[By telegraph to the Tribune.]

"WASHINGTON, August 28.

"The retaliatory message"——

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAULBEE. That the article being read, or the head lines which have been read, clearly indicate that it does not relate to the pending question. There are members who want to oppose this bill, and as the time is limited we do not want to have irrelevant matter injected into this discussion.

Mr. CHEADLE. If the gentleman will just allow this article to be read he will see that it has a bearing upon the question.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor and can debate the question as he pleases.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman claimed the floor and sent this article to the desk as a part of his remarks. The Chair thinks that the rule requires, especially in this consideration hour, that the remarks applied to a pending bill should relate to the subject-matter under consideration.

Mr. CHEADLE. But I ask to have read an article which bears directly upon the management of the Pension Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is one with regard to raising the salaries of certain officials.

Mr. TAULBEE. If it relates to the bill under consideration, I do not object; but the time is very limited and should not be consumed in reading irrelevant matter.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman can debate the bill in any manner he pleases.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Having the floor, my colleague has the right to proceed in his own way.

Mr. TAULBEE. I insist that the point of order must be well taken, and the gentleman, if he is going to oppose or favor the bill, must confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. But the gentleman has the right to oppose the bill in his own way.

Mr. CANNON. The undoubted right. The question is as to whether the matter submitted by the gentleman from Indiana is in order. The question raised by the gentleman from Kentucky is to the effect that in a debate of this kind the gentleman should confine himself to the bill under discussion.

Mr. TAULBEE. I have no objection to the article being read if the matter relates to this bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If the Chair will observe carefully the proceedings just read, he will find that at no stage of that colloquy did the Chair recognize the gentleman from Indiana as entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] stated that if there was no desire for debate he would call for a vote, whereupon the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] rose and stated that he desired to have this paper read, which the gentleman from Tennessee was perfectly willing to have read; but he did not yield the floor. He has so stated to-day and he so stated then. I do not think it exactly courteous or fair to take him off the floor in this sort of way. I do not think the gentleman on the other side should attempt to do it.

Mr. CHEADLE. We want time to discuss this bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. We have but an hour altogether; and if your side occupies an hour now in opposition, we can not have the bill properly considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no hesitation in sustaining the right of the gentleman from Indiana to the floor. He had not only been recognized by the Chair, but questions of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky and by other gentlemen recognized the fact that the gentleman from Indiana was on the floor in his own right. The only question was how he should proceed. The Chair does not think there is any question as to the gentleman's right to the floor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. How much time remains to the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. WASHINGTON]?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will have his full hour, and can claim it immediately after the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. How much time has the gentleman from Indiana remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have the RECORD examined to see how much time the gentleman from Indiana had occupied.

Mr. PAYSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYSON. This bill being considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, is there any limitation on debate except the hour rule?

The CHAIRMAN. No, unless limited by unanimous consent by order of the House.

Mr. TAULBEE. I call up my point of order, and think by reading the RECORD the Chair will have sufficient knowledge to see just exactly the point I made. The paper was not read.

The CHAIRMAN. It is impossible for the Chair to decide the point of order until the article is read. How can the Chair tell whether it is relevant or irrelevant? It is impossible to determine in advance.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask the Clerk to read an article from the New York Tribune of Wednesday, August 29, 1888.

The Clerk read as follows:

CAN SUCH THINGS BE?—HERE IS A PLAIN DUTY FOR CONGRESS—PUBLIC FUNDS FOR CAMPAIGN USES—A PLAIN VIOLATION OF LAW—CLEVELAND'S VETOES TO BE DEFENDED—WHAT WILL IT COST?

[By telegraph to the Tribune.]

WASHINGTON, August 28.

The retaliation message was only one expression of the sense of desperation which overwhelms the President and his political advisers. It was one which he could not refrain from making public. Private expressions of the same sort are not wanting, but, as far as practicable, they are withheld from the public ear. It now becomes the duty of the Tribune correspondent to call attention to one of these quiet expressions. While the Administration organs have overflowed with praise of the pension vetoes, the managers of Mr. Cleveland's canvass have been brought to realize that the veto messages, with their cruel flippancy, had excited the active hostility of Union veterans and their friends, irrespective of party, and that "something" must be done. The "something" decided upon is briefly this: The preparation and circulation of a campaign document devoted to a defense of the vetoes.

This document with which it is proposed to flood Indiana, Ohio, and other States which were loyal to the Government while Mr. Cleveland's Southern friends were seeking to destroy the Union will contain, of course, citations from such of the veto messages only as contain no phrases which can be construed as insults to the soldiers and friends of the Union. The preparation of this document was begun some two weeks ago.

Where? In the Pension Bureau in this city, a public building which belongs not to Mr. Cleveland, nor to the Democratic national committee, but to the Government of the United States.

By whom? By six clerks, or special examiners, more or less, of said Pension Bureau, who are paid by the United States, and assisted by scores of clerks and copyists, who, also, are paid from the Treasury of the United States.

The whole "outfit" is under the supervision and direction of "Physical Wreck" Black, who receives a pension of $1,200 per annum, plus a salary of $5,000 per year and traveling expenses, which in the course of the last year exceeded those of the General of the Army of the United States. Black, again, is under the orders and subject to the control of the Democratic national committee. Four of the six clerks, or special examiners, who are and have been employed on the document mentioned are named, respectively, James Kennelly, $1,400 per year; Samuel R. Hersey, $1,800; William Smith, $2,000, and Abial W. Fisher, $2,000. In their work the six persons mentioned have been authorized to call to their assistance such other clerks, copyists, etc., as may be necessary, and the archives of the Pension Bureau have been placed at their disposal for all purposes relating to their investigations and labors.

It is not too much to say that the adjudication and settlement of many claims of disabled veterans and needy widows have been postponed by, and on account of, this campaign work which is now in progress solely for the benefit of Grover Cleveland. He must feel like a sort of pensioner himself, although neither he nor his late substitute ever had his name actually placed on the rolls of the Pension Bureau, where Black's name "heads all the rest."

It is said that the work will be completed next week, and it may be hoped that the persons engaged upon it will then be permitted to resume their legitimate duties. It may be fairly estimated that by the time the work is done and the manuscript forwarded, postage free, to Chairman Brice, the actual cost of it in dollars, saying nothing of the demoralization and derangement of the office, or delay in the settlement of deserving claims, will not fall short of $5,000, which, of course, must come out of the money appropriated for the administration of the pension service. This seems a small sum; it is a small sum. It is only a little more than four times Black's annual pension. Probably it is not more than one-third the amount "saved" by all of Cleveland's vetoes of individual pension bills; it is only one-half as much as he has contributed to the Democratic campaign fund out of his own salary; it only slightly exceeds the amount required to pay for a whole year the pension of fifty-two pensioners at the "total disability" rate of $8 per month. It is cheap; but what do the Union veterans think of it—say the 13,000 needy and destitute veterans who are supported by public charity in almshouses, as Cleveland's substitute was?

Of course, there is another matter also to be considered. The clerks and others who are engaged in this work are liable to prosecution and punishment under the penal provisions of the civil-service law, but they would lose their places speedily if they should refuse to do the task. The official or officials by and under whose direction or by whose consent such a thing is done are liable to like prosecution and punishment. Moreover, a public officer who imposes an unlawful task upon a public employé is guilty of a diversion of public funds, and is liable to prosecution under the statute prescribing penalties for malfeasance in office and embezzlement of the public money. In a word, the matter is so serious as to demand a speedy and thorough investigation by Congress. It is a duty which can not be shirked.

Mr. CHEADLE. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the passage of this bill, because in my judgment it is not required by the necessities of the service. The present force of the medical division of the Pension Office consists of one referee, one assistant referee, two qualified surgeons, eighteen medical examiners. These officers were created by section 4776 of the Revised Statutes which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4776. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to appoint a duly qualified surgeon as medical referee, who, under the control and direction of the Commissioner of Pensions, shall have charge of the examination and revision of the reports of examining surgeons, and such other duties touching medical and surgical questions in the Pension Office, as the interests of the service may demand; and his salary shall be $2,500 per annum. And the Secretary of the Interior is further authorized to appoint such qualified surgeons (not exceeding four) as the exigencies of the service may require, who may perform the duties of examining surgeons when so required, and who shall be borne upon the rolls as clerks of the fourth class; but such appointments shall not increase the clerical force of said Bureau.

Mr. CHEADLE. This bill increases the number of qualified surgeons to three. There is no necessity for the bill so far as it refers to the qualified surgeons, for section 4776 already provides for the appointment of four if the necessities of the service shall require that number.

We have been told for months and the story has been repeated over and over again that the present administration in the Pension Department has transacted more business, has granted more pensions, than any of its predecessors. I want to state this fact because it may have escaped the attention of members that prior to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, the number of employés was only 744. During that year the clerical force of the Pension Department was increased 810, so that the force after that year consisted of 1,544 employés. These employés were added to the clerical force of the Pension Department during the administration of Mr. Dudley. He educated, classified, and drilled these employés so that when the present Commissioner of Pensions took charge of that office in 1885 he found the department consisting of 1,554 employés thoroughly drilled and educated in the duties, and he found more than that, he found every pension claim filed in that department under Colonel Dudley, when Colonel Dudley resigned, briefed up to the day of his resignation, and the status of the claim plainly stated on the jacket of each claim, so that in the very nature of things there should have been a large increase in the amount of work accomplished by that bureau over any of the previous administrations because of the fact that the force of the office had been more than doubled in 1883.

My next objection to the bill is the fact that the expenses of the Pension Office are, in my opinion, quite large enough now. Let us examine the expense of the Pension Department to the Government for the last fiscal year, and to get at the real expense we must take the entire cost of the force in all the departments that are kept on pension work.

There are in the Surgeon-General's Office 427 employés. Not less than 280 of them must be, and, in fact, nearly all have been, at work on pension business. Annual salaries, $512,940.

Adjutant-General's Office, 584 employés. Not less than 200 must be, in fact General Drum said in February, 1887, "that all the available force" was at work on pension business. Annual salaries, $703,700.

Pension Office, 1,554 employés. Annual salaries, $2,448,750.

RECAPITULATION.

Salaries of 1,554 pension employés	$2,448,750
Salaries of Adjutant-General's Office on pension work	575,000
Salaries of Surgeon-General's Office on pension work	425,000
Total annual salaries pension employés	3,448,750

The Third Auditor's Office should be charged with quite a large sum, but I have not included any of its cost to the Treasury Department, nor shall I in this estimate. It is now quite large enough; $3,448,750 a year would, Mr. Chairman, pay the annual pensions of 35,924 veterans at $8 per month. I insist that this sum, vast as it is, must be quite sufficient to defray the expense of our Pension Department. If it is not, then I shall insist that it is our imperative duty to simplify the practice of that department so that hereafter such a vast annual expenditure shall not be required. If we add to this expense the attorney fees, we shall find that it costs the tax-payers of the Government and the pensioners nearly five millions a year to disburse the pensions granted by the nation. General Black, the present distinguished Commissioner, appeared before the Committee on Appropriations in February, 1887, it being near the close of the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress, and made a lengthy statement in response to questions propounded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN]. I shall read from the official report of that statement.

Mr. CANNON. What is the whole clerical force that you have in your bureau—about the number?

General BLACK. I do not know exactly. Fifteen hundred and fifty-four is the total number provided for, and I think those now employed number 1,541.

Mr. CANNON. In the interview before this committee some little time ago I understood you to say that you expected to so dispose of the business before your bureau during this and the coming fiscal year that on the 30th of June, 1888, there could be a very large reduction made in the clerical force of your bureau. Am I correct in that?

General BLACK. I do not know, Mr. CANNON, whether I ever said that before the committee or not; but I have had some little talk with you about it.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask you what is your understanding about it?

General BLACK. If there be no additional legislation by the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, we could dispense with a large number.

Mr. CANNON. About how many?

General BLACK. I can not tell. If there is additional legislation——

Mr. CANNON. Upon the theory that there will be none?

General BLACK. Taking the present legislation?

Mr. CANNON. Could you dispense with several hundred, do you apprehend?

General BLACK. Yes; I should think 150 or 200 could be dispensed with. That would be a very unhappy bit of information to a great many, but it is probably true.

Mr. CANNON. Do you recollect the increase that was given in your bureau for the fiscal year 1882-'83?

General BLACK. Only by what I find of record. Mr. Brock, the assistant chief clerk, who is here, informs me that the number added at that time was 810. That is a matter that I did not concern myself with, it being a portion of the changes that lay before the time when I took charge of the bureau.

I call special attention to two facts prominently set forth by the distinguished Commissioner. First, that of the force of 1,554 employés of the Pension Office, 810 had been appointed during the fiscal year 1882 and 1883, and must therefore have become thoroughly efficient by the spring of 1885, when he took charge of the office; and second, the broad and unqualified statement that taking the legislation then in force, and provided no further legislation was enacted increasing the work of the office, he could by June 30, 1888, dispense with the services of—to use his exact words, "I think from 150 to 200 of the employés can be dispensed with."

There has been no legislation which has in any sense materially increased the work of that office, none that in any way increases the work of the medical department. Has there been a decrease of from 150 to 200 employés? No; there has been no decrease at all. The present year's appropriation bill provides for the entire force for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

Mr. Chairman, in the face of this record I can not see any reason whatever for the passage of the bill now before the House, a bill which increases the number of the medical board from twenty-three to twenty-nine, and increases the annual salaries in the sum of $20,450; a bill which proposes to change a whole class of employés carried from year to year as the exigencies of the service may require upon the appropriation bills, and create twenty-nine statutory offices, which will hereafter require an annual appropriation of $62,100 until such time as some future Congress may see proper to repeal the act creating them. I do not believe the demands of the service require it. I am persuaded that it is best to adhere to the present liberal and ample appropriation for salaries of the Pension Office.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party, with a blare of trumpets, went before the country in 1884 demanding, with all the zeal of a host of hungry place seekers, a reform in the administration of the Government and promising the most rigid economy should Cleveland be elected. He was elected, and we now stand at the middle of the third quarter of the fourth year of that reform and economic Administration, and what, Mr. Chairman, is the condition which confronts us? The promises of reform and economy have not, I regret to say, Mr. Chairman, been kept; like all promises from that source they have not materialized, and upon footing up appropriations made and pending we now realize that the reform and economy of Mr. Cleveland's administration have cost the nation the modest sum of $95,000,000 more than the administration of Mr. Arthur. The bill under consideration proposes to increase this vast sum in the amount of $20,450 a year. Mr. Chairman, because I love an economic administration of Government more than I can Democratic promises of economy and reform, is my reason for opposing this specimen sample of those articles as we are supposed to view it, and insist upon adhering to the appropriations made, whereby we can save $20,450 a year.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the passage of this bill. At the outset I am met with this difficulty. I do not understand how this bill came before this committee or the authority it has to report it. I find by the bill itself, which was introduced on the 4th day of January, 1888, by Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, it was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department. It proposes an increase in the force of employés in one division only of the Pension Office and an increase in the salary of the employés in that division.

Now, the rules of the House, Mr. Chairman, and I read from Rule XI, clause 3, provide that the appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government pertaining to the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, for their expenses, shall go to the Committee on Appropriations. And pursuant to that rule an appropriation bill is reported year by year in that Committee on Appropriations providing for this class of employés, how many shall be named, the duties they shall perform, and the sums to be paid to each and all of them. Of course the Committee on Appropriations having jurisdiction of that subject it is for them to recommend to the House the number of employés which are necessary and the amount of money to be paid to them in performance of such duty.

And we all know, as a matter of legislative experience, that the Commissioner of Pensions and the other bureau officers appear before the Committee on Appropriations and make their recommendations and submit arguments in favor of increases whenever in their judgment the exigencies of the public service require it; and I find by reference to the legislative appropriation bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations this year and passed by this House that the Commissioner of Pensions was satisfied, so far as appears from this bill, with the force, Mr. Chairman, that has been there in that division for the last twelve years, and was perfectly content with the salaries that were being paid to each employé for his services. Nothing appears to indicate other than that he and they were perfectly satisfied with the existing conditions. That general bill provides for one medical referee at a salary of $3,000, one assistant at a salary of $2,250, two qualified surgeons at a salary of $2,000 each, and eighteen medical examiners at a salary of $1,800 each; and the fact is disclosed by the RECORD, if any one will take the pains to look at the debate on that question when the bill was under consideration, that there was no claim suggested by any one that the force was insufficient or the salaries not enough.

But the gentleman from Michigan is prevailed on by somebody to introduce this bill, entitled "A bill to increase the efficiency of the medical bureau of the Pension Office," and this efficiency is to be increased mainly by the increase of the salaries to an aggregate of $20,450 per year to the employés of that bureau. It is an unusual thing to start out with; but I am opposed to it on principle. If there is a necessity, Mr. Chairman, for an increase in the force of any division of the Pension Office they ought to have it, and I am willing that they should have it. There is no branch of the public service that demands at the hands of Congress liberal appropriations or the payment of efficient salaries to efficient employés for the transaction of the public business more than the Pension Office.

But I insist, sir, that the duties which should be and have been faithfully and efficiently performed for the last fifteen or twenty years under Republican management for the amount of salary provided in the legislative appropriation bill for this year ought to be performed by gentlemen who happen to occupy these positions, and who are of the opposite political party, on the same terms and with equal efficiency. No question has been made since I have been in public life, to my knowledge, as against the efficiency of these persons or their ability for the performance of the duties assigned to them in this bureau of the Government when under the control of Colonel Dudley and his predecessor. There never was a time in that part of the history of the Government, so far as I know, when the positions that these gentlemen now hold have not been regarded as desirable, and when applicants have not been eager and swift in their applications for appointments to these positions; and they are then, when seeking the place, willing to perform the duties devolving upon them for the salary fixed in the existing law.

It is only a pretense that any one of the gentlemen who are now appointees in the Pension Office and beneficiaries under this bill would perform more efficiently the duties of his office if this increase were accorded. They are all content to keep the places they have and at the salary fixed by existing law.

The bill is only to help the worthy, needy political brother out. That is the simple truth of the matter. To add a small increase in the force of that small division of twenty-two employés and increasing the pay-roll $20,450.

Mr. Speaker, it will not work: increasing the efficiency of the division! It is a subterfuge; there is nothing whatever in it. It is only another step in the direction we have so often seen taken since the party represented by the gentlemen on the other side has been in power in this Government, of increasing the number of officials and their salaries. That is a fixed Democratic policy in practice.

I remember very well, sir, in 1880, when the national Republican convention was in session in the city of Chicago, and when a question was presented to the convention involving a proposition of a pure civil service for this Government, that the convention and the country was somewhat startled by an energetic inquiry made by a gentleman from Texas, who wanted to know, "What are we here for?" [Laughter.] It is well understood what he meant by the inquiry, and that question was taken up and the changes rung upon it by speakers of your party, Mr. Chairman, all over the North and the West, indicating, as was asserted on every stump throughout the whole country, that the pretense of the Republican party for reform in the civil service was a mere sham, and that Mr. Flannagan struck the key-note of the question in his famous inquiry.

Since then in each political campaign the Republican party has been charged with extravagance and prodigality in expenditure of the public money, with maintaining not only an unnecessary army of useless officials, but paying them extravagant salaries; and the Democratic party, never noted, so far as I have observed, for its modesty of profession or any infertility of promise—no matter how barren it has proved as to performance—frightened the people into a belief of the charges against us and succeeded to the control of the Government.

And since then how they have performed here!

If Mr. Flannagan, of Texas, was a member of the Democratic party and had been present during the last four years he would have had no occasion to inquire what that party was here for so far as patronage is concerned. [Laughter.] And his patriotic heart beyond all question would have been warmed within him and been more than satisfied with the energy manifested, efforts vigorously made, and the success always achieved even down to to-day by gentlemen of his party in securing all they desire in results, of not only enjoying the sweets of possession of office, but increasing its desirability by increase of pay.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is due to the people of this country that the Democratic party's performances should be at least an equivalent of the Democratic party's promises of "economy, retrenchment, and reform" when they succeeded in getting power in this House under a pretense demonstrated to be false, but under which pretense they secured the election four years ago.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. What proposition has been here to make appropriations of public money that your side has not to a man voted for and supported?

Mr. PAYSON. There is one proposition now pending, this one, that gentlemen on this side have not voted for and will not; and all that have been passed, all increases of salaries, have been passed by the Democratic party and passed by a Democratic majority and without a dissenting vote on your side of the House, or an expression of opinion against it, so far as I am advised. Your side present all these proposals, because you control the committees, and no one knows it better than the gentleman [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. I remember when the public-buildings bill was up for consideration——

Mr. CHEADLE. The gentleman, I suppose, remembers the action that was taken on this subject, especially by the gentleman from New Jersey, in opposing such propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has one minute of his time remaining.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to say in that one minute, Mr. Chairman, that I am reminded by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] that when this bill, the legislative bill, was under consideration upwards of thirty points of order as to increases of salary were made by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN]. I do not know how this is, but I assert now and the record will show that in the history of the Government there has never been a time when there have been so many increases in offices and salaries as since this Administration has been in power, and they have been passed by the votes on the other side of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I am in favor of all needed increases in the clerical force of any of the Departments of the Government and of the payment of good salaries for service so rendered, but I am opposed to increasing the pay of appointees under this Administration above that paid Republicans for many years, for services conceded to have been equally as efficient as those now being performed, and by employés of equally as high a standard as those now in the public service.

These gentlemen now in office were not ignorant of what Republicans were doing and had done for years for these salaries. They eagerly sought these positions, and got them; and now, sir, by my vote, they shall not be released from the obligation to perform these duties for what we did.

Let the Democratic party and its appointees, if they can not validate the charges made against the Republican party, at least make an honest effort to redeem its pledges of economy, and be content with an equally efficient performance of duty at the same salaries as its predecessor, and on that score the people, with their observation of this Administration, will be content. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HERBERT. In the five minutes yielded to me I desire, in the first place, to welcome our Republican friends in the new rôle that they are now playing on economy. I assure them, although I have no authority to speak for anybody but myself on this side, that I am very well satisfied that if this bill comes to a vote there will be at that time, as there always is when a question of economy is up, more members on this side voting on the side of economy than on that side. I think the gentleman from Illinois is entirely justified in his criticisms, and I welcome them. There is no reason in the world why we should increase these salaries. If they were sufficient ten years ago, or fifteen years ago, they ought to be sufficient now. Notwithstanding this bill is reported unanimously by Republicans and Democrats on the committee, it seems to me that this House ought to make an example of every such bill as this and sit down on it. Money is worth more now a great deal than it was ten or fifteen years ago. If the officers could afford to do the duty of any of the positions enumerated in this bill ten years ago for $2,000, I can see no reason, and there can be no good reason, why $2,400 should be paid them now. The excuse is made by gentlemen who have reported the bill and favor it, that some of these men threaten to resign in case the salary is not increased. Suppose they do. It is no irreparable hardship for a public officer to resign his place, if in his opinion he can do better elsewhere. If he should resign there are plenty of men all over the country and in every State of the Union, in every Congressional district, who are capable of performing these duties who will only be too glad to have an opportunity to do so. So I say, in my opinion, this bill ought to be defeated; and I am very sure it will be defeated. I would be entirely willing to trust it to the Democratic side of this House; and if it comes to a vote, I predict that there will be more voting against it on this side of the line than on that.

Mr. CHEADLE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN].

Mr. SOWDEN. I agree with my friend on my right [Mr. HERBERT, of Alabama]. I believe, as he believes, that this bill should be defeated. There is no reason for any increase in the salaries of these officers, and I am surprised that we should be called upon to increase their salaries at the suggestion of one of the parties interested and a beneficiary under the act, because the report alleges that the medical referee himself urges the passage of this bill which proposes to increase his salary from $3,000 to $3,600.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SOWDEN. I have no time.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I want to tell you that the medical referee has not asked for the passage of this bill.

Mr. SOWDEN. Then the report which I have before me misrepresents the fact.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That may be.

Mr. SOWDEN. The bill proposes to increase the force as requested by the Commissioner of Pensions and the medical referee; and it also provides for an increase of salaries.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It was the action of the committee that the salary of the medical referees should be increased by this bill.

Mr. SOWDEN. It seems to me that the salaries of these officers should not be increased. We have declared ourselves in favor of a most rigid, honest, and economical administration of the Government. We have placed ourselves on record against any increase of officers and against any increase in official salaries; while this bill proposes to increase the expenditures of the Government $20,450 by increasing the number of these officers and the salaries of those already in the service.

I am surprised that the committee having this bill in charge should have recommended its passage, particularly when we are in favor of the strictest kind of economy in the management of governmental affairs under the present Administration.

We believe in lopping off all unnecessary offices and dispensing with all unnecessary office-holders, and paying those in the public service a just compensation for the services they render. It has been said that we have increased the expenditures under this Administration some $95,000,000 over and above the expenditures of the administration that immediately preceded this; and yet we have here an attempt to still further increase that amount. I am opposed to this unnecessary increase of the public expenditures, and I hope this bill will meet the doom it merits by its defeat. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CHEADLE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I thank the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] for his courtesy. This bill was introduced by an eloquent and able Representative on the Republican side, Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan.

Mr. PAYSON. A victim of misplaced confidence.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. And it was not dreamed by the committee that he was working the Trojan horse for the purpose of inviting a raid that would involve almost the destruction of the United States Treasury. Our committee honestly believed that the people of this country wanted efficient service. They were free to believe that you could not obtain the best class of medical service for the salaries you paid, of about $2,000; that you could not induce first-class surgeons and physicians, oculists and other necessary specialists to give up their practice and to come here and take these positions.

We thought if our physicians and surgeons are incompetent that great loss would ensue to the Government or to the pensioners; they might make improper allowances, which would involve a raid on the Treasury or an unjust allowance to the pensioner and thereby deprive him of what is honestly due him, and it is my experience that just such mistakes are liable to be made and pensioners injured. Now, I undertake to say that there is no reputable physician in this country who will not say this increase in salaries should be made and the best medical talent secured. From the resignations that have occurred in that department of men of recognized ability, I believe that you could even improve upon the present medical force.

Mr. SOWDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Yes, I do.

Mr. SOWDEN. We could not improve upon the officers of this Administration.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I have listened to the economical remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania with a great deal of patience. [Laughter.]

Now, as the distinguished and extremely competent gentleman at the head of the medical board, Dr. John Campbell, has been referred to, I think it proper to read the following from a private letter received from him concerning the pending bill. He says:

I desire to say that the bill 1548 was not my bill. I did not prepare it, nor was I instrumental in preparing it in any way, nor in presenting it to Congress. I have asked nothing for myself, but I have asked as an act of justice that the medical examiners in this bill for an increase of their salaries be provided for by Congress.

If there is any point to be made in this matter by those opposed to the measure, let them make it on the medical reference; he says that it is an act of justice to the medical examiners to do so, for I am sure that the medical profession of this country from one end to the other will not look with favor upon any attempt to prevent a just recognition of the services of medical men connected with the Pension Bureau. The letter was intended to be private, but in justice to Dr. Campbell I think it proper to place its substance here in the RECORD.

Now, I am not referring to this matter in any spirit of partisanship. These buncombe speeches that are made here to-day on both sides of the House we all understand perfectly well, and for my part I have heard them over and over and over again until I almost feel like imitating the little boys and calling out "chestnut" on them. [Laughter.]

So far as this question is concerned, it ought to be dealt with on its merits, and gentlemen ought not to take an opportunity like this to thrust in their little speeches about "economy," because the people understand very well how much they are worth when applied to an increase of expenditures in the line of increased intelligence.

You gentlemen also know that there will be no chance to have your predictions about the vote upon this bill tested, because at the end of this hour its consideration terminates and up goes the bill. [Laughter.] Therefore my naval friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] can very safely say that he is satisfied that a large majority of the Democratic members of the House will vote against this bill, knowing very well that there will be no opportunity to bring the matter to the test. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that a large majority of the Democratic members and of the Republican members of this House are in favor of improving the pension service wherever it is needed, especially as we spend hundreds of millions in pensions, and that on sober second thought they will admit that the salaries paid to the medical examiners are not sufficient to secure and retain the services of the best medical talent. Everybody knows that they are small compared with those of the legal examiners, those gentlemen who contrive to get good, large salaries in every branch of the public service. [Laughter.] I trust, Mr. Chairman, that you are not looking at your watch on my account. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute of his time remaining.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Then I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BRUMM. I shall object to any remarks being printed in the RECORD, or to anything that requires unanimous consent, until justice is done me by allowing me to print my testimony.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Then I will ask permission of the House to have read now what I desire to have read in this connection. Have I consent?

Mr. BRUMM. If it requires unanimous consent, you have not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CHEADLE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman, Mr. CHEADLE, has only five minutes remaining.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, the most limited arrangement as to time that was contemplated between the gentleman in charge of this bill and myself was that I should have ten minutes. Gentlemen all know that I would hardly get started in five minutes [laughter], so I will yield my time to the gentleman from Missouri to have read whatever he desires.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, we all have leave to print on the Chinese bill; if necessary I will print my remarks as an amendment to that bill. [Great laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TAULBEE. If the gentleman from Missouri declines the courtesy which I have offered him——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I am grateful to the gentleman, but I will print in the RECORD the balance of my remarks.

Mr. BRUMM. I shall object.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. You can not.

Mr. BRUMM. I shall.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Oh, no; the objection is overruled. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] has very kindly yielded me his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there is little less than two minutes of the consideration hour remaining.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Of course, Mr. Chairman, we expected to hear from our Republican friends on the other side of the House just such a tirade on behalf of "economy" as we have listened to to-day. This bill was introduced by one of their ablest members, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. It is true that somebody on that side suggested awhile ago that he was "a victim of misplaced confidence." How often is the gentleman from Michigan a victim of misplaced confidence? I thought his eyes were as wide open as those of my friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], and that he never had sand thrown in them. He introduced this bill, I presume, in good faith, and the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department took it into consideration in good faith. We examined into the facts, and we are not afraid of the responsibility for any consequences that may result from the passage of the bill, because we believe that the medical division of the Pension Bureau ought to be administered in such a way as to save this country an immense unnecessary outlay in more ways than one. By having an unfair or improper decision from the medical department of that bureau you damage either the pensioner on the one hand or the Government on the other, according as the decision may fall on the one side or the other. I have no idea that skilled medical men can be employed for $1,800 a year.

Mr. PAYSON. The Republican party furnished them for twenty years, and will do it again after next March.

Mr. WASHINGTON. The legal examiners receive $2,000 a year, and they have much less difficult duties to perform than the medical experts, who are required to examine the papers in these pension cases and to trace back a disability which exists to-day to a wound or an injury incurred in 1861, 1863, or some other year of the war. No tyro in medicine can do work like that; no $1,800, no $1,000 man can do it; and yet to-day there are nineteen clerks who are paid only from one thousand to eighteen hundred dollars a year to do such work.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour for consideration of bills has expired, and the committee will rise.

Mr. BRUMM. Before the committee rises, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a personal explanation——

The committee rose; and Mr. DOCKERY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 1548) to increase the efficiency of the medical division of the Pension Bureau, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. McCREARY obtained the floor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask leave to extend my remarks. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] withdraws his objection.

Mr. BRUMM. I objected to the request of the gentleman to extend his remarks in the RECORD; and I wish——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). There is nothing before the House. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] has been recognized.

Mr. McCREARY. I call up for present consideration the special order, being House bill No. 11309.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] rise?

Mr. BRUMM. For the purpose of making a personal explanation for half a minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to make a personal explanation. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRUMM. I objected to my friend from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] printing in the RECORD anything beyond what he said. From that it might be construed that I am opposed to the bill. I desire to say that I am a member of the committee that reported the bill, and am in favor of it. I think the objections to it are based on a "penny-wise and pound-foolish" retrenchment.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. You withdraw your objection to the extension of my remarks?

Mr. BRUMM. No, sir; I do not. [Laughter.]

FISHERIES.

The House resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. 11309) to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McCREARY. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] proceeds, I would like to have some agreement with gentlemen on the other side with regard to terminating the debate and having a vote on this measure. We have already consumed two days on this bill. It is very important we should get through with it. So far as I have heard we are all for the bill. Every member, with the exception of one, is in favor of it, as I understand. I see no reason why other business should be delayed by taking up so much time in the discussion of this bill. Therefore I hope that our friends on the other side will agree to a time when we can consider the previous question as ordered upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill, so as to take a vote upon its passage.

Mr. HITT. It was the hope, I believe, of both sides of the House that a final vote on this bill would be reached to-day. But three hours of to-day's session have already been consumed in other business. Though a number of gentlemen desire to be heard on this bill, it is quite likely that we can reach a vote to-morrow, if, in addition to that portion of to-day now remaining, we have two hours to-morrow for debate. I make that suggestion.

Mr. McCREARY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], as I understand, suggests that we go on with the consideration of this bill to-day and have two hours more to-morrow, the time to be equally divided.

Mr. HITT. I can not say that my proposition will be agreed to on this side. I make it rather as a personal suggestion.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas (to Mr. HITT). You mean that there shall be two hours on our side?

Mr. HITT. Two hours on each side; there are two hours remaining to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that up to this time one hundred and eighty-nine minutes have been occupied by gentlemen on the right of the Chair, and one hundred and sixty-one minutes by gentlemen on the left.

Mr. McCREARY. I think the Chair is mistaken in that computation.

Mr. BAYNE. I freely consented that my colleague [Mr. SCOTT] should have whatever time he desired to speak on this bill. I consider it one of very great importance—fraught with very grave consequences; and I feel it is but just that those of us who wish to speak upon this measure should have a reasonable time in which to do so. I am certain that a number of gentlemen on the other side, as well as on this, wish to be heard; and I am quite sure that two hours to-day and two hours to-morrow will not give sufficient time. I therefore suggest that the vote be taken on this measure to-morrow afternoon at half past 4 o'clock, which will give abundance of time, and that there be now a unanimous agreement to that effect.

Mr. McCREARY. If agreeable to gentlemen on the other side, I suggest that at 4 o'clock——

Mr. BAYNE. I was going to suggest that the morning hour and the consideration hour be omitted to-morrow, so that we may have the whole day for this discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that there is no consideration hour on Friday.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I did not intend to meddle with this discussion; but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] have thought proper to refer to me in their speeches in connection with the remark I made about this message of the President being a magnificent campaign document. I insist on having the right to be heard before the debate is closed. I want to get in; that is what I mean. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCREARY. I have agreed to give the gentleman some of the time at my disposal.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. All right.

Mr. McCREARY. I propose that to-morrow at 4 o'clock, if it be agreeable to gentlemen on the other side——

Mr. BAYNE. I suggest to the gentleman that the understanding be that the consideration of this bill begin to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered to-morrow, commencing immediately after the reading of the Journal, until 4 o'clock, at which time it be agreed the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I suggest that to-morrow, being Friday, is private bill day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] asks unanimous consent that the consideration of this bill be continued to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal, and that at 4 o'clock the previous question be considered as ordered upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I object, for the reason that I think this bill ought to be allowed to take the ordinary course in this House, and each member be permitted to have his say upon it, if he wishes to say anything. Up to this time, I believe, the discussion has been confined principally to members of the committee. The chairman [Mr. McCREARY] says he understands all members are in favor of the bill. I do not know where he gets that information.

Mr. McCREARY. I give notice that to-morrow at 4 o'clock I will move the previous question.

Mr. HITT. It is the understanding, I suppose, that the time given to debate on the bill shall be fairly divided?

Mr. McCREARY. Oh, yes.

[Mr. SCOTT again addressed the House. For his speech complete see page 8353.]

Mr. McCREARY. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. SCOTT. Very well.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that gentlemen who objected to limiting debate on this bill do not object any longer. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the consideration of this bill after the adjournment to-day be resumed to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal, and that at half past 4 o'clock to-morrow the previous question be considered as ordered on the engrossment and third reading of the bill and also on its passage.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I want to understand the effect of this proposition. I desire to say a few words on this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that after the adjournment to-day the consideration of this bill be resumed to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal, and that at half past 4 o'clock to-morrow the previous question be considered as ordered on the engrossment and third reading of the bill and also on its passage.

Mr. DAVIS. I would be glad if the Chair would inform us how much time has been occupied thus far.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Of course the Chair understands that the time is to be equally divided.

Mr. DAVIS. But I would be glad to know how the account stands up to date.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Up to this moment there have been occupied two hundred and seventy-nine minutes by gentlemen on the right of the Chair and one hundred and sixty-one minutes on the left.

Mr. PAYSON. A parliamentary inquiry: Has the time assigned to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] been exhausted by him?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not been. The gentleman has yielded temporarily in order that this request may be submitted.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky provided the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not take all the time to-morrow. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] to couple with this request the further request that the time shall be equally divided. If the Chair is misinformed on that point——

Mr. NELSON. That is, that there shall be an equal division from the beginning of the debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly; that the entire time is to be equally divided.

Several MEMBERS. That is fair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky as stated by the Chair?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I desire to make some remarks on this bill, and unless I can be assured of an opportunity to do so I shall object.

Mr. DAVIS. It will be borne in mind, I presume, that about one hour and three quarters are still due to our side.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask unanimous consent that the session of this evening be extended until the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] shall conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the last request of the gentleman from Kentucky will be submitted first. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that this day's session be extended until the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall have concluded his remarks.

Mr. BURROWS. There is no objection if it is understood that no other business is to be done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the understanding.

Mr. McCREARY. The request of the gentleman was that his time be extended for that purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

The gentleman from Kentucky asks that by unanimous consent, after the conclusion of this day's session, the further consideration of the pending bill be resumed to-morrow after the reading of the Journal, and that at 4.30 p. m. the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the engrossment and passage of the bill, the time to be equally divided between the two sides of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I stated my objection. I have some remarks to make. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

VETO MESSAGE—RUSSEL L. DOANE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President; which was read, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith return without approval House bill No. 2507, entitled "An act granting a pension to Russel L. Doane, of Peck, Sanilac County, Michigan."

It is proposed by this bill to pension the beneficiary therein named as the dependent father of the late Demster Doane, late Company D, Thirty-fifth New York Volunteers.

The only information I have concerning this case is furnished by the report of the committee of the House to whom the bill was referred. There is nothing alleged in the report except that Demster Doane, who was a second lieutenant in the company and regiment named, died at Peck, Mich., on the 22d day of September, 1881, and that the deceased up to the time of his death supported his father, the claimant, who is now over eighty-one years of age, incapable of manual labor and destitute of the means of support.

There is no intimation that the death of the son, sixteen years after the close of the war, was caused, or in any way related to his military service. I do not understand that it has ever been claimed that a parent should be pensioned for the death of a son who had been in the Army, unless his death could be traced in some way to his Army service.

While this case is probably one where the exercise of generosity would be pleasant and most timely to the recipient, I can not think that such a precedent should be established.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, September 6, 1888.

FISHERIES.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to thank the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] for having allowed me to precede him in this debate.

Mr. Speaker, I think it was Prince Bismarck who once made the remark that the Schleswig-Holstein question in Europe was one that no diplomat or statesman could understand, and in fact that he did not understand it himself. But, sir, he settled that question eventually after the German Empire was consolidated, by taking possession of Schleswig-Holstein and incorporating it into the German Empire. I think I may safely say that this whole fishery dispute between Great Britain and the United States, or rather between Canada and the United States, is as complicated as was the Schleswig-Holstein dispute in Europe.

It would be impossible, in the time permitted for the discussion of this question, to take it up exhaustively from the beginning. Nor is it necessary for me to do so. Should I attempt it, I would have to begin practically at the point when Canada was first settled by the French and Nova Scotia by the French and English. While the Spaniards were seeking an El Dorado and a short route to the Indies in the southern half of this continent, the French and the English were colonizing in the north and endeavoring to acquire territorial jurisdiction; and perhaps no more valuable discovery or acquisition was made by them, as considered at that day, than the fishing interests of Nova Scotia, the island of Cape Breton, and Newfoundland, including also what are known as the Grand Banks of the present day. Canada and Cape Breton were French colonies and Nova Scotia an English colony. To the wealth-producing power of the fishing banks of Newfoundland they attached more value than to any other portion of the rights and privileges which they enjoyed under these settlements and acquisitions.

In 1745, Great Britain being at war with France, Governor Shirley, of Massachusetts, devised a plan for taking Louisburgh, which was adopted by the Legislature of that province, in secret session, by a majority of one vote. The forces were promptly raised, and William Pepperell was appointed commander. Connecticut sent 516 men, New Hampshire 304, and Massachusetts 3,250, who embarked in one hundred New England vessels, and supported by a British squadron, under Commodore Warren, landed near Louisburgh April 30, and Louisburgh was captured June 17, the forty-ninth day of the siege. It is hardly necessary for me to say that the French were dispossessed of Cape Breton mainly by the American colonies in the capture of Louisburgh; and here our rights as the then subjects of Great Britain had their beginning.

Following the preliminary treaty of peace, concluded between Great Britain and the United States November 30, 1782, of which article third relates to the fishery question, came the definitive treaty of peace, concluded September 3, 1783, our commissioners being John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, and John Jay; and of that, article third relates to our subject. Our rights as therein set forth were not asked as a concession from Great Britain, but, as John Adams afterwards said, "were demanded as an ultimatum; that when the British ministers found that peace could not be had without that article, they consented; that we asked no favor, we requested no grant, and would accept none," in the consideration of a privilege of which we were co-equal owners with Great Britain.

In the treaty of 1818 between the United States and Great Britain Albert Gallatin, our minister to France, and Richard Rush, our minister to Great Britain, were the plenipotentiaries on the part of the United States, and Article I of that treaty relates to the subject.

This article embodied every right in relation to this subject which we had acquired. What is the language? I quote from the treaty:

ARTICLE I.

Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the coast of Newfoundland, which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands, on the western coasts of Newfoundland; from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks from Mount Joly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company. And that the American fishermen shall have liberty forever to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland, here above described, and of the coasts of Labrador; but so soon as the same, or any portion thereof, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purposes with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground. And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

Whenever you get away from the treaty of 1818, and Article I of that treaty, you are sailing without compass and without a chart.

The next treaty between Great Britain and the United States which concerns us was what was known as the reciprocity treaty, concluded June 5, 1854. The plenipotentiary on the part of the United States was William L. Marcy, Secretary of State, and on the part of Great Britain the Earl of Elgin, then governor-general of Canada. Article I of that treaty relates to this dispute.

This, sir, was also under a Democratic administration. It will be observed that under the provisions of this article none of the rights and privileges heretofore enjoyed by our fishermen under previous treaties were abridged, and that the restriction upon our fishermen not to fish within the 3-mile limit was removed.

Under this treaty with Great Britain certain Canadian products were admitted into the United States free of duty—among others, fish of all kinds. By the terms of Article V of said treaty it was to remain in force for a period of ten years from the date it went into operation, and further for the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties had given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same. When this treaty was abrogated our privilege to fish within the 3-mile limit fell with it, but not our rights as set forth in Article I of the treaty of 1818.

I have but briefly outlined the history of the past relating to this subject, that those who may desire to do so can refer more fully to the data I have considered. And I desire to say here that Article I of the treaty of 1818 clearly defines our rights in connection with this whole subject. We can ask for nothing more, as a right, than what belongs to us, and we should accept nothing less. And while our privileges have been enlarged by subsequent treaties between the United States and Great Britain, such additional privileges terminated with the life of the treaty which gave them, and we had Article I of the treaty of 1818 to fall back upon. Nowhere in Article I of that treaty can I find that, as a right, we could demand of Canada what the New England fishermen ask to-day; but as privileges they are reasonable and just, when our policy towards Canada is considered.

But here, sir, I shall not confine myself to the subject as it deals with the past, but will consider it as a partisan question, forced upon the country by a Republican Senate for partisan purposes, regardless of every other interest; and to do this I will endeavor to show how our rights have been protected under Republican as compared with Democratic administrations.

We come next to the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, proclaimed July 4, 1871. This treaty was negotiated under a Republican administration, and the commissioners on the part of the United States were Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State; Robert Cummings Schenck, our minister to Great Britain; Samuel Nelson, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; Ebenezer Rockwood Hoar, of Massachusetts; and George Henry Williams, of Oregon.

Articles XVIII to XXV inclusive of this treaty related to the fishery question. Article XXX related to the transportation, in part by water and in part by land, from one point in the United States, through Canada, to another point in the United States. Article XXIX related entirely to the transportation of goods in bond between Canada and the United States, and it is to the last six lines of Article XXIX that I desire particularly to call the attention of the House. Article XXVII related to the joint use of the canals of the two countries, and Article XXVIII related to the right of British bottoms to navigate Lake Michigan.

Article XVIII of this treaty relates to fisheries. It was substantially Article I of the treaty of 1818, and conceded the right of our fishermen to fish within the 3-mile limit of Canadian territory; but those rights terminated at the expiration of the treaty. This gave us also the right to fish on the shores of the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and the colony of Prince Edward's Island and the several islands thereunto adjacent, which we did not possess under Article I of the treaty of 1818. I may say that the settlement of what are known as the Alabama claims formed the principal subject-matter of the treaty of 1871, while the fisheries question was but incidental to it.

I now desire, sir, to call the attention of the House particularly to Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 and its provisions, not only as they relate to the bill now before the House, but also in connection with Senate bill No. 3173 and House bill No. 10786, of the Forty-ninth Congress, relating to this subject, and the act approved March 3, 1887, the result of these bills.

But before referring to this article more fully I would call the attention of the House to the fact that the trade relations between Canada and the United States had not been provided for by treaty stipulations prior to 1871, except by the treaty of 1854 which had been abrogated in 1866. They were provided for by statutory law of the United States, revocable at the option of the Government when the interests of our people were to be served thereby. Sections 2971, 3005, 3006, and 3102 of the Revised Statutes provided how and in what manner goods and merchandise in bond should pass between the two countries under our statutory laws before the treaty of 1871 went into effect, and sections 2866 and 4347 were enacted to carry out the treaty of 1871. But, as I have said, most valuable privileges, temporarily conceded on our part to Canada prior to 1871 and revocable at pleasure, by Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, we parted with during the life of that treaty, a period now of eighteen years. But what is more remarkable, under this article they are made to apply to concessions by Canada to us, and which Republican Senators claim are in full force and effect to-day and which they claim will require two years' notice to abrogate, and for which we received nothing in return.

I quote from Mr. Blaine's "Twenty Years in Congress," where he comments upon the treaty of 1871. I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

It would not be just to impute carelessness to the American members of the Joint High Commission in framing the articles of the treaty relating to the fisheries. It is quite evident, however, that they had not closely studied the question and had allowed the British commissioners to gain an advantage.

It was not wise to forfeit, by the assent of so imposing a body as the Joint High Commission, our right of protest against the injustice of its provisions and to agree practically to the assertion that our fishing rights began in 1818.

But a much greater blunder was committed. * * * By practically conceding in the first place that money should be paid to Great Britain and by leaving to the Reference to determine the amount without any limit whatever, they (the American commissioners) offered a great temptation to wrong dealing against which the United States has reserved no defense and could secure no redress.

Mr. SCOTT. That is the criticism, Mr. Speaker, of the historian, not of the politician. It is a Republican historian criticising a Republican administration and a Republican board of commissioners, who undertook to negotiate that treaty and protect the interests of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. If it is not too long. I have so much regard for the gentleman's capacity——

Mr. PHELPS. I will endeavor to make it very brief.

This commission to which reference is there made was appointed by the advice and consent of the Senate. It did not make a success. The commisions which reported the Chamberlain treaty made a greater failure; and I wanted to ask the gentleman if the appointment of that commission was also with the advice and consent of the Senate, or if it was not made in defiance of the Senate and against their protests?

Mr. SCOTT. I will answer that question later on, if the gentleman will do me the honor to follow my argument.

Mr. Blaine does not criticise Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, to which his language is even more applicable than to the fisheries, when he says:

It is quite evident, however, that they had not closely studied the question and had allowed the British commissioners to gain an advantage.

Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is agreed that for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been or may from time to time be specially designated by the President of the United States, and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit without the payment of duties through the territory of the United States under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit without the payment of duties from such possessions through the territory of the United States for export from the said ports of the United States.

It is further agreed that for the like period goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America and destined for the United States may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit without the payment of duties through the said possessions under such rules and regulations and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the governments of the said possessions may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit without payment of duties from the United States through the said possessions to other places in the said United States, or for export from ports in the said possessions.

Mr. SCOTT. Now, to fully comprehend this article we must understand the situation as it existed in 1871. Canada at that time had no sea-port for five months in the year; the Grand Trunk Railroad terminated at Montreal, and the St. Lawrence River was closed for five months in the year by ice. There was no other possible way for Canada to export her products and import what she desired during the winter months except through the ports of the United States, and she would have been practically excluded from the outside world had not the privileges contained in the twenty-ninth article been granted to her.

Treaty obligations being reciprocal, Canada conceded to us as a nation the same privileges that we conceded to her so far as concerned the importation of goods in bond between the two countries. But this concession on the part of Canada was absolutely worthless to us at that time, and has only been utilized in later years to a moderate extent by the importation of English salt and other coarse commodities into Montreal, which have been transported in bond to Chicago and other Western ports. But even here Canada derived a greater benefit from such importation than our people did, because she secured the transportation of this business to her railroads from Montreal to the Detroit River, a distance of about 600 miles.

Now, the privilege we conceded Canada, under this article, of importing goods in bond through the United States was of great advantage to her, as I have said, and from which we also derived some benefit, as our railroads at least got something for the transportation of these importations. But the great injustice done us under this treaty is embraced in the concession contained in the last clause of Article XXIX, as follows:

And under like rules and regulations and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit without payment of duties from the United States through the said possessions to other places in the United States, or for export from ports in the said possessions.

Why our commissioners should have accepted this right from Canada by treaty stipulation as a concession to us is incomprehensible to me.

Referring to the privileges conceded by Canada to us under the last clause of Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 and also Article XXX, let us fully understand what in fact we gave away and its value to Canada. From the formation of our Government down to the present time we have absolutely prohibited foreign vessels from engaging in our coastwise trade, and no gentlemen have been more strenuous in maintaining this policy than the Republican representatives of the New England States in both Houses of Congress. They are always protectionists where protection puts ducats into the pockets of their people, and they are equally good free-traders when such a policy also benefits their people, regardless of the interests of any other section of the country. The navigation laws of the United States prohibit a foreign ship from taking a cargo of lumber from Portland, Me., to New York. This is in the interest of the New England vessel-owner and American seamen on the high seas, and no party in this country objects to it. Now, a vessel is a vehicle of transportation upon the water, and a railroad-car a vehicle of transportation upon land. Under the articles referred to, the pretended concession made by Canada to us is that the cars of her railroads may enter the United States, there loading them up with our produce and merchandise, carrying them to the northern boundary of the United States, say the Detroit River, there crossing and transporting this produce and merchandise 600 miles through Canadian territory, entering the United States again by the Victoria Bridge at Montreal or other points on the New England frontier and delivering this produce and merchandise, either for home consumption in the Eastern States or for exportation from New England ports to Europe.

These cars are then again loaded up with Eastern manufactures, protected under our tariff laws from 30 to 100 per cent., and carried up to Montreal, again transported over Canadian railroads, re-entering the United States at Detroit and other ports on the Detroit River, and delivered at all our great commercial centers in the interior of our country. Now, let us look at this for a moment. The cars in which these goods are transported were built in Canada and out of Canadian material, by Canadian labor, and they were permitted under this provision to enter and re-enter the United States without duty upon them. It is true that American cars enjoyed the same privilege for our local traffic over Canadian railroads without the payment of duty to Canada; but if a Canadian railroad desired to purchase a car manufactured in the United States, a duty of 30 per cent. was levied by the Canadian Government upon such car, and if a locomotive belonging to a Canadian railroad, where the railroad was owned by citizens of our country, should have the simplest repairs done to it in the United States, on its return into Canada it was subject to a Canadian tax for such repairs, although utilized for transporting local American tonnage over their roads.

Under the provisions of this article which I have referred to a Canadian car is permitted to go into the pineries of Michigan and there be loaded with lumber, transported about 100 miles in the United States to the Detroit River; thence, as I have said, 600 miles through Canada to Montreal, and unloaded in Portland. If this is not free trade with Canada in railroad transportation then I do not know what it can be called; but not free trade in fish, fresh or salted. Yet to-day you can not find a Republican Senator or Representative from the New England States who favors depriving Canadian railroads of this privilege, although it is impossible for any man advocating the theory of protection to reconcile this state of affairs with the principles underlying the laws governing our coastwise trade.

The President should have been given the power absolutely to terminate such a condition of affairs, as insisted on by the House of Representatives in the Forty-ninth Congress, not only upon the ground that Canada had violated Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, but that it had been a concession on our part to her for the past eighteen years for which we have received no equivalent. No conscientious protectionist should have objected to the granting of this power to the Executive. The country may not know what we have given away under the provision referred to. During the last winter I obtained at a great deal of trouble, from official sources, the following data of the number of Canadian and American cars which were loaded in the United States with American products and merchandise under the privileges conferred by this article of the treaty of 1871, transported through Canada on Canadian railroads, re-entering the United States again, and either distributed locally in the United States or exported; which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Number of Canadian and American cars, and weight of contents, transported in bond from one point in the United States through Canada to another point in the United States, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, not including the car transportation in bond between the two countries.

Mr. SCOTT. This report shows a gross tonnage of about 5,000,000 tons carried by these Canadian railroads of American produce and merchandise from one point to another point in the United States through Canada. I have had a careful estimate made of the gross money value to Canadian railroads from this business, and a very low estimate is $6,000,000 per annum. Good authorities put it at $8,000,000. Now when we consider that the steel rails over which this immense tonnage is transported in Canada are not subject to a duty of $17 per ton as are those of the railroads of the United States; that the labor employed in the transportation of this produce and merchandise in Canada pays no tax into our Treasury, nor consumes the home produce of our farmers, we can have some faint idea of the injustice that is done, not only the wage-workers of our railroads but those employed in all our industries to operate, equip, and maintain our roads by the continuance of this policy.

To show how directly our people are interested, it is necessary to understand how the railroad business of the country is done. The employés of the railroad companies of this country, as a rule, are not paid by the month, but by the number of trips; the engineers, firemen, conductors, and train-men are always so paid, and when there are no trains to go they remain idle without pay until their turn comes. Now, if this 5,000,000 tons of freight had been transported over American railroads, it is a very easy calculation to ascertain the employment it would have furnished our own people instead of giving it to the people of Canada. This is true protection.

The present ministry of Canada is so interwoven with the Canadian railroad system that the two must either swim or sink together. The large public debt of the Dominion has been incurred mainly by subsidies to her railways, and it is an undoubted fact that to-day the Canadian railroads are supported largely by the American traffic, local to the United States, which I have referred to. It is folly to claim that Canadian railway competition cheapens the cost of transportation in the United States.

Mr. McCREARY (the hour of adjournment having arrived). Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to conclude his remarks this afternoon?

Mr. SCOTT. I would prefer to proceed in the morning. There is very important matter connected with the debate, to which I desire to call the attention of the House.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I suggest that the gentleman proceed with his remarks until two minutes to 5 o'clock, when I will ask him to yield to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SCOTT. I shall be very much obliged if the House will consent to permit me to conclude my remarks in the morning, when I will also answer the question of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. McCREARY. If the gentleman will now yield, as the hour for adjournment is close at hand, I will make that motion.

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. McCREARY. Before making the motion to adjourn, I desire to ask unanimous consent on behalf of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he may be allowed to conclude his remarks in the morning. How much time, Mr. Speaker, remains to the gentleman?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has occupied fifty-five minutes of his time.

Mr. SCOTT resumed his remarks at 2.30 p. m., September 6.

Mr. Speaker, when the hour of adjournment arrived yesterday I had proceeded in the line of my argument from a short historical account of how our rights to these fisheries originated to the practical results growing out of the treaty of 1871, and I submitted to the House certain data showing what we had conceded under the last six lines of Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871. I will now resume at that point.

The treaty of 1871 has been in force for a period of eighteen years, and, as claimed by the Republican Senate, is in force to-day. Under an award made by a commission created by this treaty we received something over $15,000,000, paid in cash by the English Government for having virtually exterminated our flag from the high seas, in connection with the Alabama depredations. Let us see now, under the last six lines of Article XXIX of that treaty, which was made to appear as a concession to us from Canada, what was the money value of the same to the people of Canada, and whether or not, from a national point of view, we have not given them, for which we have received no consideration, value to nearly five times the amount paid us under the Alabama award.

I have shown that for the year ending June 30, 1887, the gross value of the traffic earned by Canadian railroads, derived entirely from the local tonnage of the United States—and this does not include the bonded business between the two countries—amounted to about $6,000,000. A low average of the gross earnings of these Canadian railroads for a period of eighteen years under this clause can not be put at less than $4,000,000 per annum; and for a period of eighteen years it would amount to a gross sum of $72,000,000. When we come to divide this between capital and labor, as experience has shown it is divided in the United States, 65 per cent. of this sum would go to labor and for materials produced in the United States, and 35 per cent. to capital. Sixty-five per cent. of $72,000,000 amounts to $46,800,000. This has been taken away from the wage-workers and the industries of the country, in the States of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, and the New England States, and 35 per cent., amounting to $25,200,000, has been received by the owners of Canadian railroads; and yet I think to-day we have more miles of railroad in the United States than in all the other countries of the world combined, and could have transported this enormous tonnage within our own territorial limits and over our own roads, or by our own ships on the Great Lakes, without the additional cost of 1 cent either to the producers or consumers of this country. Can it be claimed, if these figures are correct, that England virtually paid us anything under the Alabama award? The country must not forget that the treaty of 1871 was made under a Republican administration and by Republican commissioners.

I will call attention of the House to Article XXII of the treaty of 1871, which provided commissioners to determine a compensation, if any, to be paid by the United States for privileges granted by Article XVIII of this treaty; and of Article XVIII I will read only the heading: "Rights of the inhabitants of the United States in Certain Sea Fisheries in Common." Under Article XVIII the restriction of the 3 miles limit was removed, conceding us a privilege which we did not enjoy under Article I of the treaty of 1818; that is, our fishermen were allowed to go within the 3 miles limit and fish in the mouth of the St. Lawrence and on the shores of the provinces of Canada.

As I have said, Article XXII authorized the appointment of a commission to determine whether the concessions granted us in Article XVIII of this treaty were of more value than what we conceded to Great Britain. Under the award growing out of Article XXII the United States was compelled to pay $5,500,000. I have in my hand an excellent authority, "The Republican Party, Its History, Principles and Policies," edited and revised by a very distinguished gentleman, an ex-Governor, and now a member of this House, the Hon. John D. Long, of Massachusetts, which I will send to the Clerk's desk to have read about five lines.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under the terms of that treaty we secured the right to fish within the shore-line of Canada, and other privileges unnecessary to mention, paying for these almost worthless rights $5,500,000, giving to Canada our markets for her fish. During the life of this treaty we remitted in duties nearly $6,000,000—the last year of its existence, in 1885, nearly $700,000, or, to be exact, $689,602.25.

Mr. SCOTT. That is not my criticism of the treaty of 1871. Bear in mind I have shown that, under Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, by a concession to Canada of railroad traffic in the United States, we had virtually given away $72,000,000, just as much as if it had been taken out of the Treasury of the United States and had been sent over to Canada. It was taken from the wage-workers, the manufacturers, and producers in the country. [Applause.]

All my life, sir, I have had a good deal to do with balance-sheets, and whenever I come to close up my account I want to see the balance-sheets; I want to know where the profit and loss account stands. I make it as follows:

Great Britain in account with the United States.

DR.

To amount paid Canadian railways under Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, for a period of eighteen years		$72,000,000
To error in award under said treaty, paid by the United States		5,500,000
To amount of duties refunded Canada on fish and fish-oils for a period of twelve years		6,000,000
Total		83,500,000

CR.

By amount received under Alabama award claims	$15,500,000
By amount received for the right to fish within 3-mile limit of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the shores of Canada	000,000,000
		15,500,000
Balance due the United States		68,000,000

But, sir, what was at the bottom of all this? Why was it done? In whose interest? During the late unpleasantness with our Southern brethren the Alabama had committed certain depredations by the destruction of our ships. Most of these ships had been insured, and the parties who suffered had made good their loss from the insurance companies, so that the Alabama claims passed mainly either into the hands of the insurance companies or of private parties who were not the original claimants. The object, therefore, was what? That these claim agents and insurance companies might get the $15,000,000 from Great Britain, whether it cost our people and our Government $100,000,000 or not.

There is hardly any portion of the United States to-day where competition does not exist between rival roads. The Canadian railroads possess no advantage as to distance over our rail and water routes from one point in the United States to another point in the United States, except as to a limited area in the State of Michigan. Take a line drawn due east and west from the city of Baltimore to the city of Chicago. The whole territory south of such a line is nearer to Portland by American railroads than it is by Canadian railroads; and yet Canadian railroads, under Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, are competitors for every ton of local business originating in this territory destined to our seaports on the Atlantic coast. All of this tonnage secured by Canadian railroads, which it is possible for them to divert from our own seaports and which they can export via Montreal, is so exported to the loss of our own ports on the Atlantic—Portland, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore; and what they carry and can not so export by Montreal they carry from one place in the United States to another.

Again, take the city of Chicago, and let us compare a rail route of Canada partly through the United States and partly through Canada to Portland, with an American railroad between the same points. I select Portland, as it is the terminus of the shortest route for Canadian roads, and the most remote point of export from Chicago on our north-eastern sea-board. The Grand Trunk Railroad of Canada, extending from Chicago to Portland, is the shortest route through Canada, and the distance from Chicago to Portland by that route is 1,145 miles, divided as follows:

	Miles.
Canadian railroads	632
American railroads in the New England States	166
American railroads west of the Detroit River	347 making 513 miles of American railroad and 632 of Canadian railroad by this route. The distance from Chicago to Portland by all American rail route is 1,153 miles, and this distance is via Boston, which can be reduced to Portland by shorter New England routes. There is, therefore, only a difference of 8 miles in favor of the Canadian railroads.

The American route is as follows:

	Miles.
Chicago to Buffalo	540
Buffalo to Albany	297
Albany to Boston	200
Boston to Portland, via Boston and Maine Railroad	116
Making a total of	1,153

It will be seen from the foregoing statement that if the shortness of the route affects the cheapness of transportation, the Canadian route offers no advantages, even when Portland, located in the extreme north-east section of our country, the nearest exporting point to Canada and the extreme exporting point on our eastern seaboard, is considered. But it will be observed that a saving in distance of 116 miles of rail transportation would be made if this produce were exported from Boston instead of Portland; the distance still diminishing the farther south we go, from New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore.

In the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress a bill known as the retaliation bill was introduced relating to this subject by Mr. EDMUNDS (Senate bill No. 3173), and was passed by the Senate and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives. This bill authorized the President in certain contingencies by proclamation—

To deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British Dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of or within the United States.

And also—

If he thought proper, to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish, or any other product of said Dominion, or other goods coming from said Dominions to the United States.

The enforcement of these provisions and powers by the President would simply result in non-intercourse with Canada.

A declaration of non-intercourse between two countries is a serious matter, but I had no fears that if this right were conferred upon the President he would ever exercise it, except as a last resort to protect the honor and the interests of the American people. If, however, you can secure justice and right for yourself by simply reserving to yourself what of right belongs to you and which no nation on the earth would claim that you are not fully entitled to, you accomplish peacefully what perhaps belligerent methods would fail to secure. For the fact that we are not in a position to do this to-day a Republican Senate is responsible.

The Senate bill was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations in the House of Representatives on the 23d day of February, 1887, who reported back to the House a substitute for the Senate bill, which was substantially the Senate bill with the following amendment:

And he may also forbid the entrance or importation, either by land or water, into the United States, of any goods, wares, or merchandise from the aforesaid Dominion of Canada or Newfoundland, or any locomotive, car, or other vehicle, or any goods that may be therein contained, from the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. NELSON. Will the gentleman allow a question just there?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman for the purpose of annoying him, but simply to call his attention to the fact that the very clause he reads was predicated upon the assumption that the British Government or the Canadian Government would violate Article XXIX of this treaty, which was assumed to be in force. I have the Belmont bill, as it is called, in my hand, and will read that paragraph:

And upon proof that the prizileges secured by Article XXIX of the treaty concluded between the United States and Great Britain on the 8th day of May, 1871, are denied to goods and merchandise arriving at the ports of British North America, the President may, by proclamation, forbid, etc.

So you observe in this retaliation bill (the Belmont bill) his right to do as you claim was conditional upon the fact that the British Government or the Canadian Government, subsequently to that time, should break Article XXIX of the treaty, which you assume now has been obsolete all through these years.

Mr. SCOTT. I will answer the gentleman, but I will do so when I come down to that point in my argument. I would say to the gentleman, just as a brief answer to his inquiry, that the notice received from the Canadian Government that our fishermen would no longer be allowed to send their fish in bond through Canada into the United States was clearly a violation of Article XXIX, in my judgment. I am aware, sir, that in 1878, Mr. Foster, agent of our Government at Halifax, wrote to Mr. EVARTS, then Secretary of State under General Grant, that by conceding to Canada that the right for our fishermen to send their fish into the United States was not covered by Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, a large sum of money had been saved under the award when we paid Canada $5,500,000 referred to herein. But, sir, I will show him how he and his friends on that side of the Chamber, in connection with a Republican Senate, made it impossible for the President to meet that difficulty before I get through.

There has been, sir, a great deal of low-down cunning work in this whole matter, and if I have time I propose to expose it.

The House bill as amended conferred upon the President of the United States the right, under certain contingencies, to abrogate Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, and also to do precisely what the bill now under consideration proposes to do as to goods passing in bond between the two countries; and to go further—not only to abrogate Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, by which we agreed that Canada might transport her goods in bond; but, sir, it gave him the power, covered by Article XXIX, which had appeared as a concession to us, by the last six lines, to stop Canadian cars from coming into the United States and transporting our local traffic from one point in the United States through Canada to another point in the United States. And it was just under these six lines, where under the guise of a concession to us, an absolute gift was made to them of $72,000,000, to which I have just referred.

House bill No. 10786, the substitute for Senate bill 3173, in the Forty-ninth Congress as amended, giving the President power to abrogate Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871, was passed by a Democratic House and sent to the Senate. The yea-and-nay vote which was called on the passage of the substitute was as follows: Yeas—Democrats 136, Republicans 1. Nays—Republicans 123, Democrats 1. Now, on the final passage of the bill substituted by the House the yeas were 256: Democrats 135, Republicans 121. The nays—1 Democrat.

When the Republican Senate refused to concur in the bill as amended by the House and the final vote was taken on the bill, whether the House should insist or recede, the yeas were 148: Democrats 16, Republicans 132; nays 136: Democrats 135, Republicans 1.

On the 24th of February, 1887, Mr. EDMUNDS in the Senate said:

I suppose it is hardly necessary to read the substitute—

Referring to the House bill.

I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference thereon, and that the amendment of the House and the bill of the Senate be printed together for the use of the Senate.

This motion was agreed to.

On the 25th of February the Speaker laid before the House Senate bill 3173, and the Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate 3173 and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Messrs. EDMUNDS of Vermont, FRYE of Maine, and MORGAN be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BELMONT, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, said:

I move that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Speaker appointed as managers of the conference on the part of the House Messrs. BELMONT, CLEMENTS, and RICE. In the conference report made by Mr. EDMUNDS to the Senate February 28, 1887, page 2387 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, after discussing the difference between the House and the Senate bill, we find the following language:

The irreconcilable point of difference between the managers of the two Houses is the insistance on the part of the House managers upon adding to the scope of the Senate bill, and so going beyond it, the further provision that, in case of injurious treatment of our vessels in British American waters, it shall be within the competence of the President of the United States to absolutely stop intercourse, not only by water, but by land, between the people of the United States and the people of the British territories adjacent, thus absolutely cutting off the continuous movement of railway trains from the British provinces to any part of the United States, and in effect reciprocally from the United States to British Dominions, either on the northern boundary of Minnesota, at the river St. Mary, at Port Huron, at Detroit, at Grosse Isle, at Buffalo, at Niagara Falls, at Rouse's Point, at Highgate, Franklin, Biddeford, Troy, Derby, and Norton, on the northern border of Vermont, and on the northern and eastern borders of Maine, at all of which places it is understood there now exist interior railroad lines crossing the boundaries of the two countries—in some cases operated and practically owned by British subjects, and in other cases operated and practically owned by American citizens.

The report further says:

The Senate managers have felt it to be a duty to decline to go to this extent—

And that—there is no present justification for reposing in the Executive this further enormous power proposed by the House of Representatives in its amendment and insisted upon by the House managers.

The absurdity of this logic is too palpable for discussion. Under the original bill as it passed the Senate, under certain contingencies—

It shall be the duty of the President of the United States, in his discretion, by proclamation to that effect, to deny vessels, their masters and crews, of the British dominions of North America, any entrance into the waters, ports, or places of or within the United States—to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or goods coming from said dominions to the United States.

And also—

Now, it will be observed that while a Republican Senate was willing to confer upon the President of the United States the greater power to exclude a Canadian vessel from the ports of the United States, and not only Canadian vessels, but Canadian products, and especially Canadian fish, fresh and salt, we find the following language:

The Senate managers have felt it to be a duty to decline to go to this extent—that is, excluding cars—and have thought it to be clear that the provisions for the protection of American interests set forth in the Senate bill and in that part of the House amendment are entirely adequate to the peaceful end in view, and that there is no present justification for reposing in the Executive this further enormous power proposed by the House of Representatives and insisted upon by the House managers.

"To the peaceful end in view" (?) The act authorized the President of the United States, by proclamation, to forbid the entry into the ports of the United States of the ships of a people with whom we were at peace. It prohibited their products from coming within the limits of the United States. But to confer upon the President of the United States the power to exclude Canadian cars engaged in the internal commerce of our country, transporting that commerce from one point in the United States to another point in the United States through Canadian territory, the distinguished Senator from Vermont held, was a power too "enormous" to confer upon a Democratic President.

Had the House amendment become a law, and which the President favored at that time, and been accepted by the Senate, it was optional with the President to exercise any one of or the whole of the powers conferred upon him under the bill. A proclamation of the President simply withdrawing the privileges enjoyed by Canadian railroads granted under the last clause of Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 could have been considered by the Canadian Government neither as a casus belli nor as an unfriendly act. We would have been thereby keeping simply what properly belonged to us. Intercourse and trade between the two countries could have continued as usual. Such a proclamation would not have been declaring non-intercourse between Canada and the United States, nor have affected the entrance and clearance of their vessels in our ports, nor would it have excluded their products from entering the United States; but the withdrawal of this privilege to participate in our internal commerce would have struck the Canadian Government and the Canadian railroads a heavier blow than could have been dealt by any other possible method short of actual warfare, and which we as a government could have adopted, and must have soon brought about a settlement of all the disputes between Canada and ourselves—that is, if we were willing in the future to extend to Canada the privileges which she has enjoyed during the past seventeen years, of participating in our internal commerce.

This whole question between the House and the Senate, so far as the Senate was concerned, was practically left to the Republican Senators from the New England States, who are supposed to be protectionists par excellence in their regard for home capital and home labor.

The drippings of commerce from these Canadian railways largely inured to the benefit of New England roads, particularly those in Vermont, as well as New England ports. The loss of these drippings, even to secure from Canada what it was claimed our fishermen and fishing interests were fairly entitled to, would have soon caused a counter-irritant in the public sentiment of New England, not only inland, but in New England seaports, that would have made the whole dispute local and not national. It would have brought about a division of sentiment of the people interested, both in New England and Canada, which would have ended in a solution of the whole subject.

Now, the opposition to this proviso in the House bill referred to came from Mr. REED, of Maine, the Republican leader in the House, and from Mr. Rice, a Republican from Massachusetts, a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and also a member of the conference committee on the part of the House, whose constituency evidently did not appreciate his efforts in their behalf in connection with this legislation, as his place is to-day occupied by a Democrat from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], though it is a Republican district, by some 5,000 majority.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the gentleman desire to say that has anything to do with the fisheries dispute?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not know that his action on that bill was the sole cause of his defeat.

Mr. DAVIS. I supposed you were well informed.

Mr. SCOTT. The active opposition of these gentlemen and of the Senate finally resulted in the House receding from the amendment as a concession to the Senate to save the failure of the bill, which would have conferred upon the President the power to exclude Canadian cars, which, if it had been granted as provided in the House bill, would have conferred upon him all the powers necessary to have brought about an amicable and fair adjustment of this vexatious and irritating difference between the two countries.

I will say that in the line of my argument it is necessary for me to follow the ins and outs of this legislation, so that it does not permit me to make as logical and consecutive an argument as I otherwise might make, but I will try to track it down.

Mr. NELSON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly, sir.

Mr. NELSON. The gentleman is in favor, as I gather from his argument, of the retaliation bill of the House in the last Congress. Is he in favor of breaking up the trade of the Northwest in favor of the trunk lines of this country?

Mr. SCOTT. That is not in the line of my argument.

Mr. NELSON. Is that your position?

Mr. SCOTT. I will answer the gentleman after awhile.

Mr. NELSON. I would like to know for the benefit of the Northwest.

Mr. SCOTT. I would again call the attention of the House to Article XXX of the treaty of 1871, and I quote as follows:

It is agreed that, for the terms of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, subjects of Her Britannic Majesty may carry in British vessels, without payment of duty, goods, wares, or merchandise from one port or place within the territory of the United States upon the St. Lawrence, the Great Lakes, and the rivers connecting the same, to another port or place within the territory of the United States as aforesaid: Provided, That a portion of such transportation is made through the Dominion of Canada by land carriage and in bond, under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon between the Government of Her Britannic Majesty and the Government of the United States.

Here, sir, under this provision the coastwise trade of the United States was virtually opened to foreign bottoms for the first time in the history of the country.

Mr. NELSON. Only as to the St. Lawrence waters.

Mr. SCOTT. No, sir; the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence.

Mr. NELSON. I meant that.

Mr. SCOTT. Please do not interrupt me.

Mr. NELSON. I want you to explain this correctly.

Mr. SCOTT. I am not discussing this question as a partisan. I shall endeavor to keep to the facts; I am not talking politics. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

But, sir, it will be observed that the high commissioners, under a Republican administration, who consented to this article were very careful that this privilege did not extend to the seacoasts of the United States, but was confined to the great inland fresh water seas of the United States, over which to-day is transported a volume and value of tonnage exceeding the entire volume and value of the exports and import tonnage of the United States, and this inland tonnage is carried on by American seamen, who, when their services are needed, can always be relied upon to defend the country, while, as shown by the testimony taken by the Ford committee, out of every one hundred seamen employed on New England fishing vessels, 75 per cent. of them are citizens of Canada, Nova Scotia, and other aliens.

I submit the following evidence taken before the Ford committee:

L. M. MONTGOMERY:

Q. What is your occupation?

A. I am a special agent of the United States Treasury.

Q. In charge here?

A. Of this district, yes, sir.

Q. What does this district include?

A. It includes Stonington to New London, Conn., all of Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Maine, and New Hampshire. * * *

Q. State whether it is customary for large numbers of aliens to seek employment in the New England States during the fishing season, and to return to their homes at the conclusion of the season?

A. It is customary, sir.

Q. State whether they come in large numbers or otherwise?

A. They come sometimes in large numbers, as many as two or three hundred; sometimes in groups of twenty-five or thirty. Generally in a number sufficient to man a ship, not less; that would be sixteen to eighteen.

Q. Do you mean a fishing schooner?

A. A fishing vessel; yes, sir.

Q. Have you had occasion to inquire and become familiar with the proportion of aliens employed as fishermen in the New England States?

A. I have.

Q. What, in your judgment, is the proportion of aliens of the whole number of persons engaged in fishing; what proportion are aliens?

A. From the data which I have obtained at the various fishing ports of the New England districts, I should say 75 per cent. were aliens.

Q. Taking the thing as a whole?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You mean persons not citizens of the United States?

A. Not citizens of the United States.

Q. What countries do these aliens belong to generally?

A. They come principally from the British provinces, some are Portuguese, some are Scandinavians, and other Europeans of less numbers.

Q. What Canadian provinces do they come from?

A. Principally from New Brunswick and chiefly from that part known as Cape Breton.

Q. They are Cape Breton fishermen?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. State whether they are men well skilled in their business.

A. They have the reputation of being excellent fishermen.

Q. Why is it that such a large number of these aliens are enabled to obtain employment here?

A. Because they engage themselves for a less rate of wages and they work more continuously and are generally less expensive than the native fishermen, and also for the reason that there are very few native fishermen left to man the vessels.

Q. What has become of the native fishermen?

A. They have been, if I may use the term, exterminated by the immigration of the aliens.

Q. And gone into other occupations?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Such as what?

A. Such as in the shoe factories, and are at the industrial centers of New England—Lowell, Manchester, Salem, and those places where there are factories near the ports—they have gone there and practically ceased to be fishermen.

Q. Then, as I understand from your testimony, the American New England fisherman is fast becoming a thing of the past?

A. Extinct, sir. * * *

Q. Do you believe their coming here is stimulated and encouraged by the owners of these fishing industries?

A. I believe that the fact that they can be obtained for less wages and will do more and better work, and their doing better work is from the condition of the natives being estranged and alienated from their legitimate work, therefore the inducement of the owner to get them.

Q. State what means they employ to get them?

A. Generally in this way: The owners of the vessels have their agents in the provinces and they inform their agents about the time that they will have boats going out to be manned.

Q. By the provinces you mean Nova Scotia and New Brunswick?

A. Yes, sir; British provinces. The agent is notified that the vessel will proceed to a certain point on the British coast and there receive the complement, usual for an outfit, sixteen to eighteen men. She is carried across by four and sometimes only three men; the balance of the crew are then taken on board through the instrumentality of the agent of the owner knowing the time and the place of their embarking, and then they go to their work in deep-sea fishing.

Mr. COGSWELL. The statement is false. It is ex parte testimony. It conflicts with the United States census of 1880, with the Massachusetts census of 1885, with Professor Baird's report on the fisheries, and Secretary Manning's statement. I say it is ex parte testimony, and the Gloucester people already through me have asked of Mr. FORD'S committee an opportunity to contradict and disprove Mr. MONTGOMERY'S statement. A fair estimate of the aliens in the New England fishing fleet is not far from 20 per cent.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to say in regard to this testimony, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman who under oath gave that testimony is as accomplished, as intelligent, and as able a man as any member of this House. He is a man, sir, entirely independent and able to live without work. He speaks five different languages; and I want, because I will take no partisan advantage in this discussion, to say that after this testimony was taken an opportunity was given for it to be controverted by witnesses who subsequently appeared before the committee, and then after this rebuttal testimony was taken before the committee the witness whose language has just been read came in, and his subsequent testimony confirmed what he testified to.

Now, sir, with this little digression, in which politics broke out from the other side, I will resume my remarks.

I now ask the Clerk to read 4347 of the Revised Statutes.

It is as follows:

Provided, however, That from the date of the President's proclamation declaring that he has evidence that the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain, the Parliament of Canada, and the Legislature of Prince Edward's Island have passed laws on their part to give effect to the provisions of the treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, as contained in Articles XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and Article XXX of said treaty; and so long as said articles remain in force, according to the terms and conditions of Article XXXIII of said treaty, all subjects of Her Britannic Majesty may carry in British vessels, without payment of duty, goods, wares, or merchandise from one port or place within the territory of the United States, upon the St. Lawrence, the Great Lakes, and the rivers connecting the same, to another port or place within the territory of the United States as aforesaid: And provided further, That a portion of such transportation is made through the Dominion of Canada by land-carriage and in bond, under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon between the Government of Her Britannic Majesty and the Government of the United States: And provided further, That the President of the United States may by proclamation suspend the right of carrying provided for by this section, in case the Dominion of Canada should at any time deprive the citizens of the United States of the use of the canals in the said Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, as provided in Article XXVII of said treaty.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would remind the House that section 4347 of the Revised Statutes, which has just been read, was the law under which the treaty of 1871 was put into effect. While section 4347 was not in the treaty itself, it was due notice to Great Britain that the treaty was subject to the statute, and that in case of a violation on the part of Great Britain of the provisions specified and defined in that statute, the power was vested in the President of the United States to abrogate Articles XVIII to XXV and XXX, inclusive, in case Article XXVII of the treaty was violated by Canada, and Article XXVII related to the canals. But you must look at the section itself to see what its provisions were, and then, entirely to comprehend and get at the true inwardness of the whole subject, you must come down to the year 1883, when the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate of the United States reported a joint resolution for the abrogation of the treaty of 1871.

This is fine work, sir. Many a man has been hung on circumstantial evidence a great deal less significant than that which can be furnished here from the official records of the statutes of the United States and of the proceedings in the Senate of the United States. You have got to read it, and you have got to understand it. The provisions of the treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, in relation to the fisheries are contained in Articles from XVIII to XXV inclusive, and also Article XXX of said treaty. What were Articles from XVIII to XXV? Articles XVIII to XXV related solely and entirely to the fisheries question. It was all fish, not only in the treaty, but in the statutes; and every other interest in this country, however great and however important, was made subsidiary to the mackerel catch.

Now let us come to the proviso:

And provided further, That the President of the United States may, by proclamation, suspend the right of carrying provided for by this section in case the Dominion of Canada should at any time deprive the citizens of the United States of the use of the canals in said Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, as provided in Article XXVII of said treaty.

Article XXVII of the treaty of 1871 referred to the joint use of the canals by Canada and ourselves. I call attention, however, to the fact that Article XXVII of the treaty did not absolutely give us the right to the use of the Canadian canals. In that article the Government of Great Britain simply agreed that it would use its influence to induce the Canadian Government to allow our vessels to pass through their canals.

But, if I am able to make myself clear, gentlemen will see that this was the only statute which put the treaty of 1871 into force and effect, and this statute referred only to Articles XVIII to XXV and Article XXX. It did not refer to Article XXIX. Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 was dealt with as a provision requiring no statute of the United States to carry it into effect; it executed itself.

Now, sir, if Canada violated Article XXVII relating to the canals, then it was within the power of the President to declare abrogated Articles from XVIII to XXV which related to the fisheries, and Article XXX which authorized Canadian bottoms to engage in our coastwise trade.

I desire now to call the attention of the House particularly to the debate which occurred in the Senate and which I send to the Clerk's desk; but before having it read I wish to say that we have come down now to a later period, to the year 1883, when the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate had reported a joint resolution to abrogate this treaty. I ask the Clerk to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the portion of the debate which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

BRITISH FISHERIES TREATY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. 123) providing for the termination of articles numbered XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and article numbered XXX of the treaty between the United States of America and her Britannic Majesty, concluded at Washington May 8, 1871, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment, which was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

"That in the judgment of Congress the provisions of articles numbered XVIII to XXV, inclusive, and of Article XXX of the treaty between the United States and Her Britannic Majesty, for an amicable settlement of all causes of difference between the two countries, concluded at Washington on the 8th day of May, A. D. 1871, ought to be terminated at the earliest possible time, and be no longer in force; and to this end the President be, and he hereby is, directed to give notice to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty that the provisions of each and every of the articles aforesaid will terminate and be of no force on the expiration of two years next after the time of giving such notice.

"SEC. 2. That the President be, and he hereby is, directed to give and communicate to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty such notice of such termination on the 1st day of July, A. D. 1883, or as soon thereafter as may be.

"SEC. 3. That on and after the expiration of the two years' time required by said treaty, that each and every of said articles shall be deemed and held to have expired and be of no force and effect, and that every department of the Government of the United States shall execute the laws of the United States (in the premises) in the same manner and to the same effect as if said articles had never been in force; and the act of Congress approved March 1, A. D. 1873, entitled 'An act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed in the city of Washington the 8th day of May, 1871, relating to the fisheries,' shall be and stand repealed and be of no force on and after the time of the expiration of said two years."

Mr. EDMUNDS. In section 3, line 2, there is a clerical error. It now reads:

"That on and after the expiration of the two years' time required by said treaty, that each and every of said articles," etc.

The word "that," before "each," should go out as a mere matter of grammar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so amended.

Mr. BAYARD. Is this the regular notification under the treaty?

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is the regular notification under the treaty.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont whether section 3, which repeals "An act to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, signed in the city of Washington the 8th day of May, 1871, relating to the fisheries," will repeal the act under which goods are imported in transit through American territory. It says "relating to the fisheries," but the Revised Statutes seem to indicate that it covers the question of transportation in bond.
